"Hereafter whenever under appropriations made by Congress, the roadway of any street, avenue, or road in the District of Columbia is improved by laying a new pavement thereon or completely resurfacing the same not less than one square in extent, from curb to curb, or from gutter to gutter where no curb exists, where the material used is sheet asphalt, asphalt block, asphaltic or bituminous macadam, concrete, or other fixed roadway pavement, such proportion of the total cost of the work, including all expenses of the assessment, to be made as hereinafter prescribed, shall be charged against and become a lien upon the abutting property, and assessments therefor shall be levied pro rata according to the linear frontage of said property on the street, avenue, or road, or portion thereof upon the roadway of which said new pavement or resurfacing is laid: Provided, That there shall be excepted from such assessment the cost of paving the roadway space included within the intersection of streets, avenues, and roads, as said intersections are included within the building lines projected, and also the cost of paving the space within such roadways for which street railway companies are responsible under their charters or under law on streets, avenues, or roads where such railways have been or shall be constructed.

"The assessments hereinbefore provided for shall be levied in the following proportion, namely: One-half of the total cost upon the abutting property owners and the remaining one-half and all of the expenses of maintenance and repairs to be paid from the revenues of the District of Columbia and from the Treasury of the United States in equal parts: Provided, That where the width of the street, avenue, or road to be paved or completely resurfaced from curb to curb or gutter to gutter, as the case may be, shall exceed 40 feet, the excess, including the cost of intersections or spaces within which street railways are required to pave, shall be paid for one-half out of the Treasury of the United States and one-half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

"Assessments levied under the provisions hereof shall be payable and collectible in the same manner and under the same penalty for nonpayment as is provided for assessments for improving sidewalks and alleys in the District of Columbia, as set forth on page 248 of volume 28, United States Statutes at Large: Provided, That the cost of publication of the notice of such assessment upon the failure to obtain personal service upon the owners of the property to be assessed therein provided for and of the services of such notice shall be paid out of the appropriation for the work, and such assessments, when collected, shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the United States and the District of Columbia in equal parts."

And the House agree to the same.

JOHN WALTER SMITH,
LUKE LEA,
J. H. GALLINGER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

ROBERT N. PAGE,
T. U. SISSON,
C. R. DAVIS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I ask that the report be adopted.

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment. I did not catch fully the purport of the last amendment agreed to by the two Houses. I take it for granted it is a compromise on the Borland amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. It is.

Mr. SMOOT. And the provisions of the amendment as agreed to are that the District pay one-half and the property owners one-fourth on each side of a street for paving?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. That the District and the Government shall pay one-half and that the property owners on each side shall each pay one-quarter.

Mr. SMOOT. Or, in other words, the District pays a quarter, the Government pays a quarter, and the property holders on each side of the street pay a quarter each?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. That is correct so far as the paving of streets is concerned; but the streets are to be maintained by the District and the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. That is, as I gather it, the purport of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHILTON in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

FINANCIAL CONDITIONS—VIEWS OF THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. NEWLANDS, Mr. STONE, and Mr. POINDEXTER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask that the unfinished business, the trade commission bill, be laid before the Senate, and that its consideration be resumed.

Mr. STONE. I rise to a privileged motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. STONE. I move——

Mr. SIMMONS. I think I know the motion the Senator intends to make, but before he makes it will he consent to yield to me for a moment?

Mr. STONE. I am going to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator yield to me to make a request?

Mr. STONE. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask unanimous consent for the publication in the RECORD of an interview given by the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McAdoo, to the New York World of July 13, 1914, answering twenty-odd questions propounded to him by certain business men of this country. It is a very fair, calm, and dispassionate statement of facts, in which the whole people are interested, by the head of this great department of the Government. I ask that it be inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the interview referred to will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask for the regular order. If we are to transact morning business, I have some petitions I desire to present.

Mr. STONE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the Senator from Missouri withhold that motion for just a moment?

Mr. SIMMONS. I inquire whether the request made by me has been granted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair put the request, and it was granted.

The interview referred to is as follows:

SECRETARY OF TREASURY ANSWERS FOR THE WORLD 20 VITAL QUESTIONS—MR. MCADOO SAYS THAT THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT WILL AGAIN, IF NECESSARY, DEPOSIT GOVERNMENT MONEY IN THE BANKS TO ASSIST IN MOVING THE CROPS, AND THAT THE FINANCIAL CONDITION OF THE COUNTRY IS EXCEPTIONALLY SOUND—NO NECESSITY WHATEVER FOR AN ISSUE OF BONDS—BUSINESS STIMULATION IS ALREADY REPORTED FROM MOST SECTIONS, AND THERE IS NO EXCUSE FOR "NERVOUS SYSTEMS"—ENACTMENT OF THE RIGHT CORRECTIVE MEASURES NOW WILL PUT AGITATION TO SLEEP AND GIVE BUSINESS THE REST IT CRAVES.

[By S. S. Fontaine.]

Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo has given to the World the first comprehensive interview to which he has submitted since he assumed office on March 4, 1913. A list of interrogatories, covering a wide range of subjects, in which the business men of the country are deeply interested at this time, was prepared under the advice of leading bankers and financial experts, and the Secretary has answered them with great frankness. The result is a document which will doubtless prove of engaging interest to all the readers of the World, but especially to those who are seeking light on the attitude of the Treasury Department on many important questions affecting the country's financial and political economy. The questions as submitted by a World staff correspondent and as answered categorically by Secretary McAdoo follow:

MONEY FOR MOVING CROPS.

"What steps are you prepared to take to assist the banks of the country in financing the unprecedented crop yield of this season?"

Answer. If the necessity appears, I shall again deposit Government money in the banks to assist in moving the crops. On June 29 a letter was sent to the president of each of the 7,500 national banks in the country asking if he expected any unusual demand in his locality for money during the next six months; if so, for what purposes and in what month it would be most needed. The replies will enable the department to determine intelligently what assistance is required.

It is my purpose to deposit Government funds not only to move the crops, but to help every kind of legitimate business in every section of the country where I am convinced that assistance is necessary or desirable.

This will be done in a sane and rational way, with due regard to conditions and not improvidently. In spite of partisan statements to the contrary, this administration has done more directly to help the farmers and business generally by using Treasury money to relieve stringency, to restore financial equilibrium, and to promote confidence than any other administration within my knowledge.

LAST YEAR'S RELIEF.

In fact, this administration, for the first time in the history of the Government, put money directly in those sections of the country where crops were to be moved and where it was most needed, taking commercial paper as security. Every business man and every banker knows what relief that gave, because it made available a vast amount of self-liquidating paper growing out of trade operations and provided a supply of money in direct response to the demands of business. For the first time since the war we had in effect a flexible currency which came into existence when needed and automatically retired when the demand ceased. This was a valuable object lesson. The country has secured the permanent benefits of an elastic currency in the new Federal reserve act.

FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM SOON IN OPERATION.

"Do you expect the new Federal reserve banking system will be in full operation in time to facilitate the crop movement?"

Answer. The new Federal reserve banks should be in operation in time to materially help the crop movement. Whether they are or not, the Treasury is ready and can extend all the aid that may be needed. The financial condition of the country is so exceptionally sound now and money is so easy that no concern whatever need be felt about the immediate future. You have not heard this year, for the first time in many years, anything about tight money this fall or any expressed fear of inability to handle the big crops that are in prospect.

The Federal reserve banks will be ready for business much sooner than expected. An immense amount of work has been done that does not appear on the surface. When the Federal Reserve Board organizes it will find comprehensive information, collected and prepared by the Reserve Bank Organization Committee, and reports made by a committee of experts, composed of H. Parker Willis (chairman), Edmund D. Fisher, Andrew A. Benton, A. Howard Wolfe, Joseph A. Broderick, Ralph Dawson, and Stephen H. Farnham, of New York, on a system of uniform accounting, clearing-house functions, commercial paper, etc.; also briefs from important clearing houses and commercial bodies on the definition of commercial paper. The reserve board will be able to get down to business quickly and expedite the final steps in the organization of the banks.

COMMERCIAL PAPER AS COLLATERAL FOR GOVERNMENT DEPOSITS.

"It has been stated that you will be willing this year to accept commercial paper as collateral for Government deposits in the banks. Will the failure of the Claflin Co., with its great quantity of unredeemed paper in the hands of the banks, be likely to restrain you in any way in carrying out this policy?"

Answer. The Claflin failure will not deter me from again accepting commercial paper as security for Government deposits. All paper accepted by the Government is passed upon by a clearing-house committee in each city and a special representative of the Government, and, in addition, each piece of paper must be indorsed by the bank offering it. So the Government has not only all the assets of the bank behind the paper, but the responsibility of the makers themselves. Last year the Treasury deposited $37,386,000 almost wholly against this kind of paper. Every dollar was paid back to the Treasury on April 2, 1914, and the Government received as profit, at 2 per cent interest, $267,844.51.

The Claflin failure, by the way, simply proves all over again what has been proved thousands of times before—the futility of overexpansion. Neither tariff laws nor alleged depression were responsible for that failure. It is the old familiar cry of "biting off more than you can chew." It also proves the economic fallacy of too much consolidation. The combination of 30 retail stores in as many separated cities got beyond the available capital of the mother concern and also beyond the "limits of efficiency."

WILL IT PREVENT PANICS?

"When the Federal reserve association is in working order, do you believe that it will prevent panics?"

Answer. Assuming wise administration, and that, I think, is certain, the new system ought to prove a successful preventive of financial panics. And why shouldn't we assume "wise administration" of the system? The able American mind is not yet obsolete and patriotism is not yet dead! There is abundant material to draw from, not only for members of the Federal Reserve Board, but also for directors of the Federal reserve banks. We are usually the slowest people on earth to correct our own abuses, but when we once begin the job we generally do it thoroughly.

We have been trying without avail for almost half a century to reform our banking laws, and then, all of a sudden, we woke up and put upon the statute books the most far-reaching and beneficial piece of legislation since the national bank act.

I look forward to a wonderful period of financial stability, with its inevitable complement of undisturbed confidence, and to an era of unequaled prosperity for this country under the new Federal reserve system. The provisions of the law, which permit our banks to establish foreign branches, together with our new tariff law, will contribute beyond the expectations of even intelligently optimistic men to the expansion of American trade and commerce. A big foreign trade will of itself tend greatly to stabilize our domestic trade and make extremes of business depression at home far less possible. Our foreign trade has always been restrained by unwise tariff laws and a lack of American banking facilities. The new laws have removed these obstacles.

WHAT CREATED BUSINESS DEPRESSION.

"Do you believe there is any truth in the rumor that there has been a deliberate conspiracy on the part of a certain group of financiers, politically opposed to the administration, to create business depression?"

Answer. No; I would not say that. It would be fairer to say that there has been a systematic attempt, politically organized, to make the country believe that there is a serious business depression. All the "divine-right" and "vested-right" interests and most of the big financiers are allied with the political opposition to the Democratic party and are helping the calamity campaign all they can. By "divine-right" interests I mean those who, because of their wealth, education, social standing, and acquired or inherited leadership of great enterprises, believe that they have superior rights and are entitled to be left undisturbed. They resent any sort of change or governmental regulation or control. You may remember that a certain anthracite coal magnate some years ago assumed that attitude when the great coal strike was on. By "vested-right" interests I mean those who have been long intrenched in "privilege" through favoring tariff laws and every sort of governmental bounty and who consider any interference with their "privileges" an invasion of sacred rights. Then we have the soreheads and chronic kickers and Pharisees who are always against an administration they can not control.

These elements, not so much by concert of action as by common sympathy, have united in a drive against the administration. They have produced the "psychology" of the situation, which, operating upon a time of the year when business, for perfectly normal reasons, is usually below par, has produced a certain amount of hysteria in shallow minds and a certain amount of fear in timid souls. But, on the whole, little has been accomplished; every day their gloomy prophecies are being dispelled by facts and the steady advance of business prosperity. Crops—prodigious crops—are beginning to move, and business stimulation is already reported from nearly every section of the country. We are going to have a splendidly prosperous fall season.

SURPLUS IN TREASURY.

As evidence of the conscienceless efforts to create uneasiness I need only call attention to the solemn predictions made on the floor of Congress a short time ago by certain Republican leaders that the United States Treasury was piling up a huge deficit and that the Secretary of the Treasury would soon issue Government bonds. How thoroughly they are discredited. The Treasury statement issued July 1 shows that the fiscal year closed with a surplus of $33,784,452.07. This amount and $1,000,000 more was spent on the Panama Canal, but that is for property bought and paid for, and is an asset, not a deficit. And an issue of Government bonds is not in sight; in fact, one can not be discovered with a telescope, much less with the oversensitive obliquity of vision of our highly excitable political opponents.

NO ALARM ABOUT GOLD EXPORTS.

"Is it true that you have at any time felt any apprehension about the gold exports?"

Answer. No; not the slightest. On the contrary, I have regarded the gold exports as a benefit to this country, because we could spare the gold and the exports have secured the foreign financial situation. International finance is so intimately related these days that a cataclysm in England, France, Germany, or any other important country reacts injuriously and directly upon our domestic situation. In time of European trouble American securities are always sold first, because there is a ready market for them. At such times there may be a sudden unloading on our market of large volumes of bonds and stocks, which is always depressing and hurtful. If we can let Europe have gold when she needs it, and we do not, and thus conserve the general situation, it protects us. The present movement has not hurt us in the least. If the papers and political partisans did not make a noise about it, as little would have been heard of it as has been felt of it, and that is nothing.

When the Federal reserve banks are in full operation they can exercise a material influence upon gold imports and exports and furnish a large measure of protection to our gold reserve if the need at any time arises.

GOLD HOLDINGS HAVE INCREASED.

"Have the gold holdings of the Treasury increased or decreased during the gold-export movement?"

Answer. They have increased. July 1, 1913, the total stock of gold in the country was $1,866,619,157. July 1, 1914, the total stock of gold in the country—after deducting all exports during the year—was $1,892,154,731, showing an actual increase in the total stock of gold for the year of $25,535,574. Not only was there a gain during the fiscal year in the total stock of gold in the country, but there was a gain of $17,363,237 in the amount of gold in the Treasury.

GOLD IMPORTS, $65,232,067.

"Since January 1 the gold shipments from the port of New York to Paris, London, and Berlin amounted to $78,000,000. Does this imply that the balance of trade between this country and Europe is no longer in our favor by reason of foreign competition?"

Answer. No; it certainly is not due to foreign competition. I believe that the gold exports since January 1—which, by the way, have been abnormal only in the month of June—do not necessarily indicate that the actual balance of trade is against this country. They are due principally to the constant sale for several months by European holders of American securities. The total exports of gold for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1914, were $112,432,165, whereas the imports of gold for the same year (June, estimated) were $65,232,067, so that the net exports of gold for the entire fiscal year just ended were only $47,200,098. This is a bagatelle, so far as affecting the strength of our position is concerned, and has no particular significance. For the same fiscal year, as already stated, our total stock of gold, in spite of these exports, increased $25,535,574. I want to call attention particularly to the $65,232,067 of gold imported during the year. This is, at least, a very tidy amount, but very little is ever heard of gold imports, whereas gold exports are played up furiously. Why? Because gold imports are not palatable to the calamity howler, and it suits his purpose best to suppress all knowledge of them.

CROPS WILL CREATE HUGE BALANCES IN OUR FAVOR.

"Do present indications point to a return flow when the grain and commodity exports season is in full swing?"

Answer. Yes; there is no doubt that we shall be able to import gold in the fall, if we want to. The marketing of our crops must necessarily create huge balances in our favor. Gold imports do not, however, always follow because the balance of trade is in our favor. If our credits can be more profitably employed in Europe, they will remain there until such time as they can be more profitably employed at home. Then they will be recalled, and gold imports will naturally follow.

THE GOLD BEHIND THE GREENBACKS.

"With the abolition of the endless-chain greenback system, will there be any danger in the future of a gold outflow in sufficient volume to be a serious menace to the Treasury holdings of specie?"

Answer. There is no danger now of any such gold outflow as will menace the Treasury's holdings of specie. The "endless-chain greenback" is practically a thing of the past. Your question implies the existence of a fear which the American people inherited from the experience of the last Cleveland administration, more than 20 years ago. At that time the conditions were essentially different. Then we had only a small and depleted gold reserve behind the greenbacks; now we have $150,000,000 of gold behind the greenbacks. Moreover, the country's total stock of gold at that time was relatively small—only about $500,000,000. Now we have the greatest stock of gold of any nation on earth, namely, $1,892,154,731, of which we hold in the Treasury of the United States $1,276,581,594. When gold is withdrawn for export it is usually upon presentation of gold certificates, against which there is 100 per cent of gold on deposit in the Treasury. The amount of greenbacks presented is relatively small.

I consider the position of the Treasury and of the country impregnable so far as gold is concerned. Moreover, our stock of gold is increasing each year not only through domestic production, which is large, but also through the constant increase in the wealth of the Nation.

We have only $349,120,016 of greenbacks and Treasury notes outstanding, against which we have a gold reserve of $150,000,000. We shall in time get a 100 per cent of gold behind the greenbacks, provided the surplus earnings of the Federal reserve banks shall be used as the act authorizes, "to supplement the gold reserve held against outstanding United States notes." This is a very wise provision of the law.

PAYING DEBTS OR LENDING MONEY.

"It has been claimed that the present outflow of gold has been due to the unfavorable balance of trade, as well as to the enormous expenditures of American tourists in Europe during this season of the year. Is it also true that, because of the railroad and other Wall Street scandals, Europe has been sending American securities back to us in enormous volume, and that the gold shipments, to a great degree, represent liquidation of the indebtedness thus created?"

Answer: The outflow of gold at any time shows that we are either paying our debts abroad or that we are lending money abroad. If we are paying debts, they may represent either imported goods, expenditures of American tourists, or the purchase of American securities which have been sent back to this country. As before stated, I think that the principal cause for the recent exports of gold is the sale of American securities by European holders who need the money and have found that they could get gold more advantageously by that means than by any other. Europe has simply needed gold, which we could easily spare, and she has got it by paying for it in one form or another, either by the sale of our securities at prices which attracted American purchasers, or by borrowing from us at interest rates which are profitable to American lenders.

MUCH DEPRESSION TRACED TO THE RAILROADS.

"What, in your opinion, is the cause of the present depressed state of business, which has reduced the operating capacity of steel and other trades and thrown many people out of employment?"

Answer: Business depression has been grossly exaggerated. The Treasury Department touches intimately business in all parts of the country, especially the banking business of the country. The reports which have come to me from many reliable and well-informed sources convince me that the chief depression exists in those industries and businesses which are dependent largely upon the railways for orders. There is no doubt about the fact that the railroads have withheld orders for supplies and have deferred maintenance of way and equipment to the utmost possible extent for the past six months. I don't say that this is illegitimate. They have been suffering from reduced earnings during this period, and caution would induce many of them to proceed slowly; but the greatest impelling motive undoubtedly has been their desire to make as few commitments as possible until the Interstate Commerce Commission has rendered its decision on their application for increase in rates. An examination of the reports of the railroads as to maintenance of way, equipment, etc., during this period would undoubtedly verify these conclusions. It is to be hoped that the rate decision will soon be made. Whether the increase is granted or not, the railroads ought to know as quickly as possible the basis upon which they are to proceed.

There has been a decided improvement in the steel business and its allied interests in the last few weeks. The United States Steel Corporation reports an increase in orders of 34,697 tons in June over May. I am confident that this improvement is going to continue; there is every reason why it should. The crop movement already begun is demanding the employment of idle cars. On June 1 the number of idle cars in the country was 242,572. On July 1, one month later, 21,697 of these idle cars had been put into service. It should be borne in mind in this connection that 207,000 freight cars were actually built during the calendar year 1913.

This large addition to the rolling stock of the railroads may account, in part, for the 220,875 freight cars reported as being idle on the 1st day of July. Before the fall crop movement is ended these idle cars will be upon the rails moving the crops from the farms to the markets and carrying commodities from sellers to buyers.

NEW TARIFF HAS NOT ADVERSELY AFFECTED AMERICAN INDUSTRIES.

"Has the lowering of tariff duties by the present administration been instrumental in any way in bringing about the depression?"

Answer. No; I have been unable to discover how the new tariff has adversely affected American industries or American interests, and I do not believe that anyone can show it. It is perfectly clear, however, that the falling off in our exports for April and May, 1914, as compared with the same months of 1913, reflects the well-known business depression in those foreign countries which are our best customers, and demonstrates the shortage of food-stuffs at home, which reduced our usual exportations of those articles.

This shortage resulted from the poor crops of last year. An analysis of our imports, which increased for April and May, 1914, over the same months of 1913, shows that the great bulk of them comprise articles that do not compete with our manufacturers. Many of them were on the free list of the old tariff act and remain so under the present tariff, such, for instance, as coffee, cotton, fertilizers, fibres, hides and skins, India rubber, raw silk, and bananas, all of which show large increases in the aggregate. Raw wool, which was previously dutiable, was put on the free list by the present law, and a large part of the increased imports are represented by that item. Nevertheless, the price of raw wool to the American producer has increased.

These importations show that our wool manufacturers must be busy turning out a larger quantity of finished goods. The duty on sugar was reduced and the importations of sugar were largely increased. It would be tiresome in the extreme and would involve a lengthy discussion to go into a complete analysis of the export and import figures for these months or for the past year and to explain the causes affecting the movement of each item involved. I refrain, therefore, from attempting it.

ENACTMENT OF RIGHT MEASURES PUTS AGITATION TO SLEEP.

"Business interests generally, regardless of politics, seem to think that a cessation of legislation having in view the regulation of railroad and industrial corporations would do much to bring about a return of confidence. Do you believe that legislation of this sort is responsible for the present business situation, or that a postponement of proposed legislation would restore confidence?"

Answer. No; legislation is not responsible for the present business situation, nor will a postponement of proposed legislation—the antitrust laws, for instance—restore confidence.

The lack of such legislation impairs confidence. The passage, not postponement, of such legislation will establish confidence. So long as the trust question remains in the political arena it will be a cause for discussion and agitation Agitation disturbs confidence. The way to effectively put out the fires of agitation is by applying corrective remedies that square with intelligent public opinion. Then confidence will be secured, because the issue will be rightly settled.

The tariff law and the currency law prove this. There is no disturbing thought now about the tariff It is settled, and the manufacturers and business men may do business on a definite basis. The currency question is settled, and there is no more uncertainty about our financial system.

Confidence in our financial future is firmly established. It is no longer the subject of debate, and so it will be with the trust question. Enactment of the right corrective measures now will put agitation to sleep and give business the rest it craves and can realize only from wise statutes.

THE INCOME TAX.

"Will the income-tax rate be increased instead?"

Answer. I see no present reason for increasing the income tax.

"Has the collection of the income tax at the source been a success?"

Answer. Yes; more so than expected.

"Is it true that complaints of the annoyances caused by the present system of collection have been so general throughout the country that the Government is considering some other method of making the collections?"

Answer. There has been an apparent attempt upon the part of the partisan press to make it appear that there has been a great amount of complaint about collection of the income tax at the source and that there is general dissatisfaction with this new form of taxation. This is not correct. I have made it a point to secure information upon this subject, and the reports we get from the collectors of internal revenue throughout the country show that there have been remarkably few complaints and very little grumbling on the part of those who pay the tax. The experience of the first year of the income tax has proved that the legislation is successful. Most people recognize the justness of this form of taxation. The law went into operation 27 days after its passage and threw upon the Treasury Department an amount of work almost superhuman in its character. The time was so short within which to prepare regulations for the collection of the tax at the source and the system was so new that a good deal of confusion and inconvenience resulted at first.

During the coming fiscal year an effort will be made to simplify as much as possible the methods of collecting this tax. The department is anxious to do this, not only for the comfort and convenience of those who have to pay it but in order to make the machinery for collecting the tax as efficient and economical as possible.

NO "TINKERING" WITH THE TARIFF.

"If the dwindling revenues of the Government continue, will the tariff bill be amended or duties in certain schedules be increased?"

Answer. The revenues of the Government are not dwindling; they are increasing. No amendment of the tariff schedules will, therefore, be necessary. It is a gratifying reflection that it will not be necessary to tinker with the tariff and that our manufacturers now have a definite basis upon which they may do business. The revenues of the Government were greater for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1914, than for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1913. The Treasury is in splendid condition, with a net balance in the general fund of more than $150,000,000.

NO BOND ISSUE LIKELY.

"Is it the intention of the Treasury Department to put out new issues of Treasury notes and Panama bonds in the near future?"

Answer No; there is no present necessity, nor do I contemplate any in the near future, for the issuance of Treasury notes or Panama Canal bonds. There have been expended by the Government out of current revenues on the Panama Canal more than $240,000,000. The Secretary has the right to reimburse the Treasury for these expenditures at any time he thinks it advisable through the sale of Panama Canal bonds, but, as I said before, no such necessity is in sight.

WE CAN FACE THE FUTURE WITH ABSOLUTE CONFIDENCE.

"What do you think of the outlook for the future?"

Answer. I think it is splendid, notwithstanding the fact that the disaster doctors have been working overtime to make the Nation sick. They seem willing to wreck business and bring suffering upon the innocent in order to destroy the administration, simply because the administration is destroying privilege and reestablishing true democratic government. But they haven't succeeded and they won't succeed. The general business situation is inherently sound and our financial position is exceptionally strong. The greatest winter wheat crop on record is already secured and the Secretary of Agriculture reports the prospect for other crops unusually promising. Our economic situation is better and sounder to-day than any other nation on the globe. With such foundations, how can prosperity be avoided? When I read the hysterical stuff that appears in the opposition press, I can not help recalling Lord Nelson's famous message to the people of England when they were in a state of fright over threatened foreign invasion, "This is no time for nervous systems" We are in no danger of a foreign invasion of goods or anything else to our hurt, and certainly there is no excuse at this time for "nervous systems." We can face the future with absolute confidence.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I simply wish to ask the Senator from Missouri a question. I ask the Senator whether he will not, before making the motion he has in mind, yield to me for a moment to endeavor to obtain unanimous consent for a vote on the interstate trade commission bill at some early date?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it will be impossible to get unanimous consent for that purpose at this time, and if the Senator should make such a request it would compel calling of the roll. I sincerely hope the Senator will not insist upon his request at this time.

Mr. STONE. We would have to call the roll.

Mr. SMOOT. In fact, I will say to the Senator now that I would object if he should make the request.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to state to the Senator from Utah that many Senators have urged me to slow up the consideration of the trade commission bill until the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] can return; he will be here on Friday.

Mr. SMOOT. I had that in view when I said I would object.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I demand the regular order.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understand the Senator from Iowa is entirely willing——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is objection to the request of the Senator from Nevada. The Senator from Connecticut calls for the regular order.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. STONE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, July 14, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, our God and our Father, ever constant in Thy ministrations, help us to walk worthy of the gifts Thou hast bestowed upon us and teach us that to know the meaning of the ten great commandments and to put them into practice is better than to know when, where, and how they came into existence; that to keep a conscience void of offense toward Thee and our fellow men is better than to speculate as to the origin. Hear us, and help us to live our convictions in the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ, for Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever, amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Journal will be approved.

CORRECTION OF THE RECORD.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, in the debate yesterday the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] in his remarks used the word "statute." In revising those remarks, which appear near the bottom of the first column, on page 13135 of the RECORD, the gentleman has changed the word "statute" to the word "resolution," which makes the remark that I made immediately following appear to be silly. Therefore I feel compelled to insist upon the use of the original word "statute" instead of the word "resolution." The Official Reporter who took down the words advises me that his notes show that the word "statute" was used by Mr. BURNETT. I am sure that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] will not take issue with me upon that subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] does not appear to be here.

Mr. BARTON. Mr. Speaker, that manuscript came to me, and, knowing that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] had acknowledged that he had made a mistake in using the word "statute" when he meant "resolution," I am responsible for making that change.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is not a matter of great consequence, but immediately following the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT], I said:

While the gentleman from Alabama said he was reading from the "statute," he is not.

To this the gentleman from Alabama replied:

I am reading from this bill.

The change of the word "statute" to "resolution" puts me in the attitude of criticizing the use of the word "statute," and when the word "statute" is stricken out and the word "resolution" inserted in lieu of it; it leaves my remark apparently without any foundation. That is the reason I ask that the original word "statute" be put back into the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the correction will be made.

COMPARISON OF TARIFF ACTS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House concurrent resolution 44, to print 10,000 copies of the compilation entitled "Comparison of the Tariff Acts of 1909 and 1913."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the House resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed and bound 10,000 copies of the compilation entitled "Comparison of the Tariff Acts of 1909 and 1913, showing the classification, rates of duty, and sections of the acts of August 5, 1909, and of October 3, 1913, together with the equivalent ad valorem rates of duty on the imports for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913," as prepared under the direction of the Ways and Means Committee by John E. Walker, assistant clerk to the committee; 5,500 copies for the use of the House, 2,500 copies for the use of the Senate, and 2,000 copies for the use of the Ways and Means Committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I notice something in the resolution with regard to the equivalent ad valorem rates of duty for the years 1913 or 1914. I do not know which it is.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There is only one year, this last one.

Mr. PAYNE. Does that mean the whole fiscal year, including the time in which the act of 1909 was in force?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My understanding is that it only includes the year from the time that the bill took effect.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, a similar publication has been made with reference to a number of tariffs, and I think this ought to be made. I am in favor of the resolution. I have no objection to it.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. May I ask the gentleman how these volumes are to be distributed?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As far as the House is concerned, they will go to the folding room of the House. Each Member will get his pro rata. Two thousand copies will go to the Ways and Means Committee; but it is usual, in printing documents of this kind, to give an additional number to the committee, because the demand from outside people comes to the committee. More than that, Members sometimes run out of their quota, and the committee has always tried to aid a Member who happens to need more than his quota, where it was possible to do so from the committee copies, regardless of which side of the House the request came from.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. About how many will that give to each Member?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There will be 5,500 copies for the use of the House. Probably the gentleman is a better mathematician than I am. It will give each Member about 10 copies. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina presented a conference report on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, but subsequently, by unanimous consent, withdrew the report.

EXTENSION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations, I present a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 300) to continue the provisions of a joint resolution approved June 30, 1914, entitled "Joint resolution extending appropriations for the necessary operations of the Government and of the District of Columbia under certain contingencies."

Mr. MANN. I reserve all points of order on the resolution.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] reserves all points of order. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the provisions of a joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution extending appropriations for the necessary operations of the Government and of the District of Columbia under certain contingencies," approved June 30, 1914, are extended and continued in full force and effect for and during the last half of the month of July, fiscal year 1915; and to continue during the last half of the month of July, fiscal year 1915, the operation of the Interstate Commerce Commission in securing a valuation of the several classes of property of carriers subject to the act to regulate commerce, authorized by the act of March 1, 1913, a sufficient amount is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, not to exceed the sum of $[illegible],000, together with any unexpended balance of a similar sum appropriated for the first half of said month of July.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. MANN. I object.

PENSION BILLS SENT TO CONFERENCE.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I call up from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 4261) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, and ask that the House insist on its amendments and agree to the conference asked for.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 4261, insist on the House amendments, and agree to the conference asked for. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the same action be taken on the following bills:

S. 4845. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 5207. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 5843. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to take the bills just reported from the Speaker's table, insist on its amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. HELVERING, and Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska.

CONFERENCE REPORTS ON PENSION BILLS.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I call up conference report on the bill (H. R. 15504) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object; the report is short.

The Clerk read the conference report and statement, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 958).

On amendment No. 7 the House concurs in the Senate amendment, as it is only a correction of service.

STATEMENT.

On amendment No. 1: The House concurs in the Senate amendment. It is not conclusively shown that the death of the soldier was due to his military service.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina calls up the conference report on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 954).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and on amendment numbered 30 of the Senate, to the bill (H. R. 15279) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

JAMES W. GOOD,
Managers on the part of the House.
THOMAS S. MARTIN,
LEE S. OVERMAN,
F. E. WARREN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill as it was brought into the House provided that mileage hereafter should be limited to the actual traveling expenses of the Member and the immediate and dependent members of his family. In the Senate that provision was stricken out and the amount under existing law was restored. Four times the House conferees have met the Senate conferees, and every item in the bill has been agreed to except mileage. Yesterday for the first time the Senate discussed the question, and took a yea-and-nay vote upon it, and by a vote of 55 to 7 the Senate insists upon its amendments. The position of the Senate as revealed to the conferees is that this is legislation on an appropriation bill, that the House has proposed the legislation, that the Senate objects to the legislation, and that the unbroken rule obtaining between parliamentary bodies of coordinate powers is that the body proposing legislation in an appropriation bill must finally yield if the other body refuses to accept the legislation.

The conferees have acted in good faith and have endeavored to carry out the wishes of the House, as the wishes of the House were made known by the RECORD. I believe that the Senate will let the bill fail rather than yield to the House upon this proposition. It is now for the House to say what it desires the conferees to do.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I notice by the RECORD that there was a good deal of discussion in the Senate about the proposition of a compromise at 10 cents a mile. I would like to ask the gentleman if that matter has been considered by the conferees?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. It has.

Mr. PALMER. It seems to me that that is the logical outcome of a dispute of this kind, where the House claims the mileage ought to be 5 cents and the Senate claims it ought to be 20 cents, and that, like other reasonable men, they could get together on some figure between the 5 and the 20. Has that been proposed by the House?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, the House conferees have suggested to the Senate conferees the possibility of a compromise at 10 cents a mile, or upon actual expenses, but the Senate conferees absolutely refuse to consider anything, and they say that they stand upon the law, and I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that all of the suggestions in the Senate in regard to a compromise came from the seven gentlemen who voted in the negative. There were 55 on the other side.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I am inclined to think that those suggestions came also from members who voted among the 55, at least some of them. Let me see if I understand the matter. As the bill stands at the present time the House insists upon actual expenses for the House Members and upon 5 cents for Senate Members. Is that correct?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. That is the legislative and the parliamentary situation.

Mr. PALMER. Of course that is an impossible and an intolerable position.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. It is an impossible and ridiculous position, I may say to the gentleman, but it came about on account of a peculiar parliamentary situation.

Mr. PALMER. Members of the House and of the Senate unquestionably are entitled to have and ought to get the same rate of mileage.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not believe that if the House would recede from both of these amendments, whatever the parliamentary procedure may be, and propose 10 cents a mile, that the Senate would agree to it?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that the Senate would agree to anything.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from South Carolina yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HARDY. If any compromise were to be made, does not the gentleman think the real and just compromise would be the actual and necessary expenses of a Member and the dependent members of his family, as was first incorporated in the measure by the House?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas will understand that I believe in the proposition as it came into the House for the actual and necessary expenses of the Member and members of his family.

Mr. HARDY. I want to say that that is what has always appealed to me as being just and right, and that, it seems to me, ought to be made or might be made the basis of compromise.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the gentleman from Texas that I am as heartily in favor of that proposition as any Member in the House. I am simply stating the condition as we find it, and that is that the Senate absolutely refuses to legislate on this subject in an appropriation bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Would it not be the proper thing and the necessary thing first to agree to the conference report?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand there is a report of disagreement, and I think no action is necessary.

Mr. MANN. I suppose no action is necessary, since the Senate did agree to the conference report.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The motion I propose will bring the matter before the House.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can not make a motion until the amendments are before the House in some shape.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This motion will bring them before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion of the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. FITZGERALD moves that the House recede from its amendment to the amendment of the Senate No. 1, and recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 1 and 30 and agree to the same.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from South Carolina to yield me three minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the question of mileage for the two Houses of Congress is one that has been the subject of acrimonious debate during my 15 years of service in this House. It is a matter in which I have very little personal concern. Under the law, at 20 cents a mile, the amount that I receive annually as mileage is $92. I am indifferent as to whether I am paid $92 for mileage as a part of my compensation or for reimbursement for my expenses, or whether the mileage be absolutely abolished. Indeed, the smallness of the amount which I receive might be a temptation for me to demagogue on this question. We have this situation, however, before us. The Committee on Appropriations this year reported a provision providing for the actual traveling expenses of Members and immediate and dependent members of their families incurred in going to and returning once from each session of Congress by the nearest route usually traveled. With such a provision as that, Mr. Speaker, the amount of mileage which I would receive, if accurately computed, would not be very different from the amount I receive at 20 cents a mile. To take myself, my wife, and seven children, five of whom must have their fares paid [applause], with the necessary and proper traveling accommodations, according to the computation I would receive nearly as much as I receive now at 20 cents a mile. Personally I have always believed that whatever the mileage fixed for Members, it should be fixed at a flat rate. I do not have any desire, and I do not think there is much necessity of compelling me to keep an account of the money that I would expend for the traveling expenses of my family in attempting to account for it. I believe that when we are appropriating money for over 500 Members of the two Houses if a flat rate were fixed, whatever it might be, it would be the best under all circumstances. The Senate struck out the provision for the actual traveling expenses of Senators, $25,500, and inserted for mileage of Senators under existing law $51,000. The House concurred in that Senate amendment with an amendment providing for the payment of mileage to Senators at the rate of 5 cents a mile, and there has been no agreement possible upon that amendment. In reference to amendment numbered 30, the House had a provision in the bill providing for the actual traveling expenses of Members and the immediate members of their families, and appropriating $87,500 therefor. The Senate struck that provision out and inserted a provision for mileage of Representatives, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners, $175,000.

Under parliamentary law the House could have taken the same action as it did in regard to the other provision. This matter has come before the House three or four times. There have been three or four record votes. I voted upon each occasion to sustain the position of the House relative to the amount to be paid for mileage. After the last vote I suggested to the gentlemen acting as managers upon the part of the House in the conference that the proposition be made that the entire matter be compromised by fixing the mileage for both Members of the House and Senate at 10 cents a mile. I believe such an agreement would have met with the approval of the House, and that the bill could have been agreed upon and become a law. I am informed that the proposition was made and rejected. The Senate, by a vote of 55 to 7, has insisted upon its position regarding mileage. This bill carries $36,000,000 for the support of the departmental services of the Government. The difference involved between mileage at the rate of 20 cents a mile and the amount estimated and fixed in the bill to pay the actual expenses of Members and their families amounts to $100,000. So far as I am concerned, in view of the action of the Senate, I believe that the House, having demonstrated its desire to make the reduction in the amount of mileage and having resorted to everything within reason that could be justified under parliamentary law to effect its purpose, that the time has now come for the House to recede from its position and agree to the Senate provision and permit the bill to become law. We gain nothing by further agitation and discussion. The responsibility for the failure to reduce the mileage from the amount fixed by law must be borne by the body which declines to yield in any respect, and we should not, in our desire to change this mileage, whatever be our motive, longer delay the enactment of this bill, so important to the maintenance and conduct of the Government. No one in this body will charge me with being an advocate of extravagant appropriations in this House. I believe that I can say my record has been as consistent in favor of proper economies as anyone here. It seems to me that the time has come when it is necessary to recognize the situation that exists and to take the necessary steps to have this bill become a law. I hope the motion which I have made, which brings the two Houses to an agreement on the mileage question, will be adopted.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I supported the House proposition to fix the mileage for Members and Senators at the actual amount of their expenses. So far as I am personally concerned, I would be very glad to see the mileage fixed at that rate now, or, rather than have this question come before the Congress every year, I would be glad to see the mileage entirely abolished. [Applause.] But we are facing a very serious condition, and the Members of this side of the House, regardless of their views in reference to the mileage question, should not overlook the responsibility that they owe to the Government. The condition that confronts us to-day is this: Here is a bill that has been entirely agreed upon except one item carried in two paragraphs in reference to the question of mileage. This bill carries $37,000.000. In its folds are the appropriations for the entire judiciary of the country, for the executive branch of the Government, for the legislative branch of the Government. If it is not agreed upon to-morrow, or a resolution passed extending appropriations for last year, the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of the Government will have to run without salary if they run at all. Now, I take it if that condition existed for a few days it might not seriously hurt, but if it existed for longer than that time it would be a serious blow for the Government of the United States. The gentleman from New York has just offered a resolution to extend the existing appropriations for last year.

That resolution has been objected to, and on account of the small number of that committee in the city at this time it is doubtful whether a rule can be immediately obtained for its present consideration.

Now, the membership of this House has expressed its position to the country on this question. There can be no doubt about it, because the roll has been called a number of times. The Senate has expressed its position on this question on a roll call. This is new legislation, legislation on an appropriation bill, and therefore is contrary to the rules of this House. The uniform practice, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has stated, is that when you put new legislation in an appropriation bill, in the end, if the two Houses can not agree, the House proposing the legislation must recede. And although it is clear that the sentiment of this House is in favor of abolishing mileage, or, at least, reducing the amount of mileage, the time has come when that is no longer the issue. The question is as to passing this appropriation bill and supplying this Government with the necessary funds with which to run it. It is the duty of every man on this side of the House, who is responsible to the country to maintain this Government, to pass this bill at this time regardless of his views on the question of whether there should be mileage or whether mileage should be abolished. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, this question has been discussed fully and freely at this session of the House, and further discussion of it would avail nothing. I simply wish to say, in so far as I am concerned, that I have not abandoned my position on the question of mileage, nor have I changed my views. As the gentleman from South Carolina has said, the House conferees made an honest, earnest, sincere, and determined effort to carry out the wishes of the House, but for the fourth time they have been compelled to report a disagreement back to the House. The Senate conferees have insisted that the Senate will not yield from its position, but will insist that the law shall remain as it is so far as this appropriation bill is concerned. And, as has been said, their position was confirmed on yesterday by the Senate itself by a record vote of 55 to 7.

The Senate conferees have insisted constantly that they were entitled to have the House recede from its disagreement because of the well-known parliamentary precedent that when one house puts new legislation upon an appropriation bill to which the other body objects, then it is the duty of the house proposing new legislation to recede.

In answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY], I want to say that the House conferees have realized from the beginning that when the House takes one position and the Senate takes another a compromise is in order. And the House conferees have been ready at all times to agree upon any reasonable compromise on this proposition, but the Senate, as I have said, has insisted that they will agree to nothing except the present and existing law of 20 cents a mile. So it is just a proposition as to whether or not you are willing to recede or whether you will adhere to the proposition as proposed by the House and possibly see this appropriation bill fail. As for me, I stand now where I have always stood. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to my colleague [Mr. RAGSDALE].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, when I came here, nearly two years ago, as a Member of this body, it was with a desire to cooperate with men who made a great Democratic victory possible. Under the splendid leadership of the Speaker of this House and the majority leader [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the Democrats have been led to victory which we never believed before could be accomplished. They have stated here, as the gentleman from Alabama has stated to-day, and before, that an appropriation bill of this character ought to pass at once, and that the cheap politics that have been played by some people here to get before the people as great reformers and economists ought not to hold up at this time appropriation bills and keep them from passing. I have voted with him consistently in this legislation, as I have in nearly all other legislation that he has offered here.

As one who has voted with him from the first, I am willing to vote as he directs now. I hope the House will take the position which he has taken and that this appropriation bill may become a law. Calamity howlers are singing all over the country of the disaster that is going to come if this and that thing is not done, and we should have a recess for a time in order to give the Democrats an opportunity to go home and meet the objections which have been made against the party. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I agree entirely with the argument made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], but I criticize them because they did not make that argument two weeks ago instead of to-day. If they had done so then, they would have saved the inconvenience and confusion in the various departments of the Government which has resulted from being 14 days under an extension of appropriations. The very argument which they are making now was just as forcible and timely then.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I was in favor of the House proposition originally, both in committee and on this floor, but two weeks ago, when the question came up whether this great bill should go into force before the year ended or whether we should have the confusion in the departments and the expense occasioned by its failing, I voted to concur with the Senate. I knew that in doing so I was carrying out the wishes of the majority of that side, though I was not in accordance with their vote. [Laughter.] They are responsible for legislation. They ought to take that responsibility, and in my opinion they ought to have taken the position two weeks ago that they take now. But I was willing to act as a cat's-paw and to vote as I thought was right and in accordance with your wishes, though against your action, and I hoped that it might prevail, even though you might still pose as economists and purists and say that against your will this legislation was forced upon you. So you are compelled now, as, I repeat, you ought to have done before, to come out and say that it is to the advantage of this Government that we should yield to the Senate in this matter. I would suggest, though, Mr. Speaker, that if they really wanted to effect this reform there was a simple way in which to do it. They could have yielded on the Senate mileage and insisted on our mileage, as the Senate would have been perfectly willing to do, and it would not have been long before the Senate would have been shamed against taking the mileage which they proposed. They would not have dared to let us take 5 cents a mile and they take 20 cents a mile. So, if that side of the House had really wanted to accomplish this reform, there was an easy way before them. But I believe now it is to the advantage of the country that this bill should no longer be delayed and that we should vote to concur with the Senate. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I judge by the rather apologetic remarks of many of my fellow mileage economists this morning that they are about to lay down before the Senate on this proposition, but I for one can not bring myself to that.

I recognize the importance of passing this great bill at this time, and I recognize also that a bill carrying so large an appropriation ought not to be held up for any considerable length of time pending a dispute about an item which is as small as this in point of amount. And yet I do not agree with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] in regard to our responsibility in connection with it. The fact is that if this appropriation shall not be passed by to-morrow an extension resolution will be passed providing for the needs of the Government——

Mr. FITZGERALD and Mr. UNDERWOOD rose.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMER. In just a minute. And, as I understand it, there are other appropriation bills which have not been passed, so that, even if this is passed to-day or to-morrow, it will still be necessary to pass such an extension resolution, and it will be just as easy to include this bill as to leave it out.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that a resolution has been offered this morning and unanimous consent asked and objection has been made, and if the gentleman does not know it, I can advise him of the fact that there is not a controlling membership of the Committee on Rules in the city at this time on this side of the House.

Mr. PALMER. Well, I have enough confidence in the gentleman's ability as a leader to believe that he can lead a majority of 2 to 1 in this House to pass a resolution to provide for the needs of the Government for two weeks.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMER. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is not in the city a majority of the Committee on Rules composed of Democrats. I doubt if they are going to be brought here. As I understand now, an extension resolution can be passed by unanimous consent if the legislative bill and the District bill are disposed of.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that the gentleman from New York or the gentleman from Alabama will seriously contend and say to the House and to the country that, though we have a majority here of 150 or 160 Members, we can not pass in this House a resolution of the character that I am talking about.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman——

Mr. PALMER. I do not care to yield further. It is safe to say that that can be done.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We have a majority ostensibly of 160 in this House, but we have not got them in Washington. [Applause on the Republican side.] And the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON] and myself are two of the Democrats who have stayed here all the time attending to the public business. [Applause.]

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, as long as there is a quorum in the city there is a safe majority of Democrats in this body, and this resolution can be passed; and every Member of the House knows it perfectly well.

Now, I want to say that there is no cheap politics in this mileage proposition, as the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE] would have the House believe. There are Members here who have been absolutely honest in the belief that this mileage "graft" ought to be taken away from Members at both ends of the Capitol. It is unfair, because it is placing the Congress in an unenviable light throughout the country, because we vote to ourselves mileage which is many times greater than we allow to any other officer of the Government. An ambassador who goes to his foreign post is allowed only 5 cents a mile. An officer in one of the departments here in the city who travels about on public business is allowed only about one-fourth or one-fifth of what we vote to ourselves.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. PALMER. Give me a few minutes more, please. Will the gentleman from South Carolina yield me five minutes more? My time has been taken up principally by interruptions.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes, Mr. Speaker; I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. PALMER. I have this to say about it, Mr. Speaker: This matter will not down. It has been, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] says, before the Congress ever since he has been here. We have had an open and a bitter fight upon it in every Congress since I have been here, and it seems to me, in order to make a final settlement of this much-disputed question, it would be better to hold up this bill for a day or two while the House insists not upon its legislative proposition but upon a compromise proposition of, say, 10 cents a mile.

I want to say to my colleagues that we shall never again get so near to a correction of this abuse as we are now. Why, yesterday in the Senate a distinguished Member of that body made a long speech in which he declared that he would wipe out all of this mileage. Why? Because Members of the House who voted for the House proposition were coming over to the Senate and lobbying for the Senate amendment. And to-day the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] reiterates the charge that we, who have voted upon this thing time after time and have gone upon record against this unfair system of exorbitant mileage to Members, are not sincere; that we do not want the reduction; and that we really want the Senate rate to prevail.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

Mr. PALMER. In just a moment. It seems to me there can be only one answer to that kind of a charge of insincerity upon our part, and that is to insist upon the proposition that we started to maintain. Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TAGGART. Was the gentleman from Pennsylvania here when we had a record vote upon 5 cents a mile?

Mr. PALMER. Yes; I have voted upon several such propositions.

Mr. TAGGART. I mean the other day.

Mr. PALMER. Yes; I was here and voted upon it.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for just one question?

Mr. PALMER. In just one moment. We have never had before this House until in this Congress a proposition to make a fair compromise at 10 cents a mile. I, for one, believe if that proposition were put up to the conferees of the Senate, with the House firmly behind it, that they would agree to it rather than permit this bill to continue longer in conference.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMER. I will yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

Mr. HARDY. I wanted to say that I voted for the bill as passed by the House covering mileage for Members and their families. I think that is equitable and fair. Does not the gentleman think he does the whole House an injustice in stating that Members voted one way and lobbied in the Senate the other way?

Mr. PALMER. I did not say that. I said a Member of the Senate upon the floor said that. I do not know whether it is true or not. I hope not.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman is putting that alleged fact into the RECORD to-day. Does not the gentleman think that is unfair unless the man who did it was named?

Mr. PALMER. I think it was very unfair in the Senate for the gentleman to make that statement. I maintain here that there is only one answer to make to that.

Mr. HARDY. Is not the gentleman spreading a rumor that——

Mr. PALMER. I do not know that I am spreading a rumor.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. PALMER. Yes.

Mr. FALCONER. Do I understand the gentleman to say that he has gone on record as favoring 5 cents a mile for his own mileage or on House Members' mileage?

Mr. PALMER. I voted for the House amendment.

Mr. FALCONER. Does not the gentleman know that he has never voted for 5 cents a mile for his mileage, but has shoved 5 cents a mile off on the Senators? And does not the gentleman know that he voted at no time to reduce his mileage below 20 cents a mile for himself or full mileage for himself and his family?

Mr. PALMER. Oh, I know the contrary.

Mr. FALCONER. No; I do not think the gentleman does.

Mr. PALMER. In a previous Congress I myself offered an amendment to this bill to make the mileage 10 cents a mile. We had a record vote upon it, and came within 4 or 5 votes of passing it. I, of course, voted for it. I have voted for the House amendment to provide for actual expenses, and the parliamentary situation was such that Members could not vote for the same amendment to apply to both; but I say to the gentleman that I am opposed to the miserable makeshift of having one rate for the House and one rate for the Senate.

Mr. FALCONER. I am glad to hear that.

Mr. PALMER. I am honestly in favor of having the same rate for both, and I believe now this troublesome question could be adjusted if the conferees representing the two Houses would sit down like reasonable men and do a reasonable thing, namely, compromise between the two items.

Mr. ROBERTS of Nevada. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMER. Before I do that I want to ask the Chair is an amendment to this proposition in order? I will offer this amendment——

Mr. MANN. It is not in order now.

The SPEAKER. Wait a minute. The Chair will examine it and see.

Mr. MANN. No motion is ahead of the motion to recede and concur.

Mr. PALMER. I do not propose to get ahead of it by offering any other motion. I am offering an amendment to this motion to recede and concur.

The SPEAKER. The motion to recede and concur is the preferential motion.

Mr. PALMER. I am offering an amendment to the pending motion.

Mr. ROBERTS of Nevada. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. PALMER. Just a moment. I move to amend the pending motion by adding at the end thereof "provided mileage for Representatives and Senators shall be at the rate of 10 cents a mile."

Mr. FITZGERALD. I make the point of order that at this stage of the proceedings the motion to recede and concur is the preferential motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is correct.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, will the Chair hear me for a moment?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time is up.

Mr. PALMER. On this point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman has not the floor to offer any motion, anyway.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that perfectly well, and rules it out of order.

Mr. PALMER. If it is ruled out of order on that account, I shall have to submit.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is out of order on both grounds.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, when I see my genial friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] in the House, I feel like saying to him "Welcome to our city." [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. PALMER. The gentleman will admit that it is only recently that I have been absent.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I made substantially the same remark when the gentleman made the same proposition in the last Congress, and it has been true ever since. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] has just stated that he voted for the 5-cent mileage proposition. The gentleman imagines that he was here, because I have the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in my hand, under date of June 25, where the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] offered a motion for 5 cents a mile, and among those voting is not found the name of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER], but among those absent I read the name "PALMER." The gentleman has been absent so much that he forgets how he votes when he is here.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] just stated that it would be an easy matter to extend this appropriation under the legislative, executive, and judicial appriation act. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] this morning reported a resolution from the Committee on Appropriations, to which I reserved all points of order, because it is not a privileged resolution. It can be brought before the House at this time in only one way, by a report from the Committee on Rules. There are various people connected with the woman-suffrage movement who have been trying for days and weeks to get a meeting of the Committee on Rules. I thought possibly we might do it in this way. There is not a quorum of the committee that will be assembled. I doubt very much whether that side of the House wants to have a meeting of the Committee on Rules just now for any purpose; but if the committee have a meeting for any purpose they will have the woman-suffrage proposition up before them you can be mighty sure. [Applause.] Then they will have to fish or cut bait.

And then there is another resolution we would like to get up before the Committee on Rules, the resolution relating to another amendment to the Constitution. The Committee on Rules have not been very active in reference to these propositions; they laid them over once, and then they laid them over again, because they could not get a quorum of the committee together.

Now some of the gentlemen think 20 cents a mile is too much, and some think it is too little. I am like many of the other gentlemen who have spoken. I do not care whether Congress pays me 20 cents a mile, or no mileage. I shall not decline a nomination or election in either event. [Laughter.] But while I am a Member of the House I shall be in Washington on attendance at the sessions of the House. [Applause.] And I think it comes in mighty poor grace for a gentleman to talk about mileage graft, a small amount, who has been drawing his salary while he has been engaged in political work for himself at home, and who has not been present in the House.

And when gentlemen talk about mileage being graft, I have been led to suppose that the man who took graft was a grafter. I would like to know the name of any Member of this House who has declined to receive what he calls this graft. [Applause.] I do not believe it is graft. If I did, I would not be a grafter and take it. The gentleman who calls it graft is a grafter if he takes it. [Applause.] We have a great pother about this. Gentlemen who are here are worrying about the mileage. I wonder that the majority side of the House does not enforce the law in reference to absences and salary. The law provides that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER], who has been away from Washington so long, shall not receive his salary while he is absent. Does he take it? If it is graft to take mileage which the law allows, is it honest to take salary which the law forbids? [Applause on the Republican side.] I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that people who live in glass houses, and mighty thin glass at that, had better be conspicuous by quietness instead of rising to debate a proposition about graft of other people. He had better remove the beam from his own eye before he tries to take the mote out of the eyes of others. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TAGGART].

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Appropriations saw fit to put into the appropriation bill a provision to take the place of existing law. This new provision was that each Member of the House and Senate should have all his expenses paid to and from Washington for each and every session of Congress, and that the traveling expenses of each and every dependent member of his family should also be paid for every session. The law that has been upon the statute books for a great many years provides for 20 cents a mile for each regular session.

This measure would not seem to me to work economy. It would all depend on the number of dependent persons in the family of the Member. It would be manifestly unfair to Members with small families. It would give a greater mileage to Members with large families than they draw now. It would allow a dependent member of any Member's family to get on a train at his home at any session of Congress and take a trip to Washington and return again. They would not have to come together or with the Member under that provision, and would not have to return when he did.

They would be at liberty to take as many excursions to and from Washington as there were sessions of Congress during the period of the Member's service. No one knows whether it would work economy or not. I, in company with a great many others here, voted for the 5 cents a mile on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina. I believe that more of the time of this House, in actual value, has been taken up in the discussion of this item of mileage than would be the difference in mileage between 5 cents a mile and 20 cents a mile. There has been feeling wrought up over it. Accusations have been made; and we have been called to task by a gentleman who was not with us when we voted for 5 cents a mile.

I want to say that there is no law against returning to the Treasury of the United States any salary or mileage paid to a Member. If some distinguished patriot here, having an afflicted conscience, will return to the Treasury of the United States the mileage he feels that he should not have taken, I will be the first to contribute $50 toward erecting a bronze tablet to his memory as the first patriot of the twentieth century. [Laughter and applause.]

The Senate has voted almost solidly to retain the old law. While it may be our duty to recede and agree with the Senate, I shall not vote to agree to continue mileage at the old rate.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has five minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I simply want to put in the RECORD section 17 of United States Statutes at Large, volume 14, page 323, act of July 28, 1866, which reads as follows:

That the compensation of each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress shall be $5,000 per annum, to be computed from the first day of the present Congress, and in addition thereto mileage at the rate of 20 cents per mile, to be estimated by the nearest route usually traveled in going to and returning from each regular session.

That has been the law for 48 years, and we are just as much bound to appropriate for it now as we were then.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote to recede upon this amendment, as I voted previously; but I do not care to discuss that now. I do want to say a word with reference to the imputation made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] that the resolution continuing the appropriations for two weeks longer could not be gotten before this House, because there are not a sufficient number of Democratic members of the Committee on Rules in the city of Washington.

I want to say to these gentlemen that there are three members upon the minority side on the Committee on Rules, of which I am one, and we have ever been ready as members of that committee to do anything that was necessary to carry on this Government, and until they call a meeting of the committee and place it before the Committee on Rules they have no right to make the statement that they have made. [Applause on the Republican side.] The reason is, however, that they are afraid to call a meeting of that committee, not because they fear this resolution will not pass, but because some other matters might be brought up before that committee if a meeting is called.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] two minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to understand that the gentleman from Wisconsin is willing to pledge himself to the House to report a resolution to extend the appropriations.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. I did not state that; I said the committee could be relied upon to do what is necessary. If that is necessary, we will agree to it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman, then, is not ready to pledge himself at this time. I wish to say, as far as I am concerned, that I am making no effort to prevent the consideration of any proposition that is before the Rules Committee at this time. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I thought I had made it clear in my statement to the House that the conferees had repeatedly proposed to the Senate conferees a compromise of 10 cents, or any other compromise, and the Senate conferees have absolutely refused to discuss the matter.

I move the previous question on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], that the House recede from its amendment to the amendment of the Senate No. 1, and recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 1 and 30, and agree to the same.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Does the motion read that the House shall recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 1? As I understand it, we are to vote on the question of receding from our amendment to Senate amendment No. 1, but we have no disagreement to Senate amendment No. 1. We have agreed to Senate amendment No. 1 with an amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We recede from the amendment of the House to Senate amendment No. 1.

Mr. MANN. And recede from our disagreement to Senate amendment No. 30, and agree to both the Senate amendments.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois is correct, and I will modify my motion accordingly.

The SPEAKER. The question is, then, on the motion that the House recede from its amendment to the amendment of the Senate No. 1, and recede from its disagreement to amendment of the Senate No. 30, and agree to the two amendments.

The question was taken.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana demands a division. Those in favor of the motion will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] One hundred and one——

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, count me with the rest.

The SPEAKER. One hundred and two gentlemen have risen in the affirmative. Those opposed will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Fifty-three have risen in the negative. On this vote the ayes are 102 and the noes are 53.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and eighty-six Members present, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and there were—yeas 132, nays 121, answered "present" 5, not voting 175, as follows:

Mr. WALTERS. Mr. Speaker, did the gentleman from New York, Mr. RIORDAN, vote?

The SPEAKER. He did not.

Mr. WALTERS. I desire to withdraw my vote of "aye" and answer "present."

The name of Mr. WALTERS was called, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present; the Doorkeeper will open the doors.

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to was laid on the table.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 17824, the general deficiency bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the general deficiency bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to ascertain whether we can not agree upon a time for the conclusion of general debate.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I have had requests for 2 hours and 30 minutes on this side. I have told the gentlemen that I assume the other side will be willing to agree to that.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman from New York say?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am trying to figure out the requests. Can not the gentleman get along with two hours?

Mr. GILLETT. These gentlemen have requested that much time, and even before Saturday. I would have to show a very difficult favoritism in telling some gentleman I could not give him time. I would not know how to select.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Cut it down a little, and that will close general debate.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? It was proposed Saturday to give this side of the House 4 hours. I understand that this side of the House has used 1 hour and 45 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It has used more than that; it had 30 minutes out of my time.

Mr. GILLETT. I figured it up from the RECORD this morning, and I figured that side of the House has used two hours and a half and we have used an hour and three-quarters.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will allow me to say, the gentleman from Massachusetts has me down for 15 minutes, and while I would like to use it—I do use time occasionally in the House—I am willing to let that go, and he can reduce his time to 2 hours and 15 minutes, which will make just 4 hours on this side of the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate be limited to 4 hours, 2 hours and 15 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] and 1 hour and 45 minutes by myself. That equalizes the time.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I will be content with that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to four hours, one hour and three-quarters to be controlled by himself and two hours and a quarter by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT]. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object this measure was before us Saturday last for several hours, and during that time not one single sentence of the English language was used on the subject matter of the bill. I wish to say now, Mr. Speaker, if they are going to allow the Members of this House on this appropriation bill, covering nearly $5,000,000, to cover every subject under the sun, they must furnish a quorum to listen to them. Now, the gentleman has asked unanimous consent, and if Members go away and leave nothing but empty seats, as far as I am concerned, I am going to object, and I do object to the unanimous consent, and whatever time is used will go in the hands of the presiding officer, and you must keep a quorum; if not, I shall make the point at the first opportunity.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the gentleman insisting on a quorum, but in order to enable the committee to equalize the time between the two sides I will ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate be controlled one-half by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] and one-half by myself.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] object to the request?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I did object to the request, and object again to this request.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman objected, that is the end of it. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] prefers another request, which is that in the general debate the time be controlled one-half by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT]. Is there objection to that?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Pending the motion, Mr. Speaker, I move that general debate on this bill close in four hours.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that all general debate on this proposition close in four hours.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I raise the question of a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut raises the point of no quorum, and the Chair will count.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. The motion, I take it, is carried. The gentleman did not object to the vote, because there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. He raised the point of no quorum.

Mr. MANN. That comes after.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. TAGGART. I make the point of order against the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] on the ground that it is dilatory. A vote has just been concluded.

The SPEAKER. Oh, no; it is not dilatory. There has been business transacted. The Chair rules it is dilatory only when a man is trying to be dilatory.

The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and fifty-seven gentlemen are present, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not have to move it, because the other vote has not been finished.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] to limit debate to four hours will, as their names are called, answer "yea," and those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 241, nays none, answered "present" 7, not voting 185, as follows:

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the time for general debate be controlled one-half by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] and one-half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] moves, pending the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, that the time for general debate be divided, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] and one-half by himself. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, does not that motion require unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It does not at the present juncture. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the general deficiency bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 17824) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1914 and for prior years, and for other purposes, with Mr. ADAMSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the general deficiency bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17824) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1914 and for prior years, and for other purposes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I yield half a minute to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TAGGART].

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, it is strange that in the midst of the greatest progress the world has ever known—mechanical, industrial, educational, and moral—the art of diplomacy seems to have undergone little or no change since ancient times. In the early ages envoys were sent from one nation to another, attended with great pomp and splendor, for the purpose of impressing upon the rulers they visited the power and glory of their respective governments. News traveled slowly in those days, and the information of the world depended largely upon exaggerated rumors.

POLITE FRAUD.

Diplomacy was studied and perfected as the art of ceremonious and polite fraud. The entertaining ruler impoverished his kingdom in seeking to outdo in splendor the visiting embassies and convince them that although they had heard of the grandeur of his court "the half was never told." Down through the centuries came these ceremonious observances and customs, bringing with them the warrant of history and the accredited habit of the ages. The end and aim of diplomacy was to seek some advantage for the nation that was represented. The crowning achievement of diplomacy was to make such alliances and combinations with the great powers as would enslave or destroy the weaker nations. In all the history of international relations until this time there is not a single instance of where a new or struggling nation was encouraged or favored by a great power. It seems to have been one of the principles of diplomacy that the weak were the legitimate spoil of the strong, that the new and progressive had to yield to the antiquated and unprogressive.

THE RIGHT OF CONQUEST.

The right of conquest was taught by learned authors of international law, and these writers derived the principles they taught from the Governments of ancient Greece and Rome. Until the Spanish-American War occurred and put the new principle of invading a nation or intervening within a nation in behalf of humanity, as the American Government did in the case of Cuba, there was not a single principle of international law that was an improvement on the statesmanship of antiquity. The basis of it was that all rights were vested in the state, and the more powerful the state the more rights it had. In international law the individual was nothing. If the peace and good order of society required it, he might be scourged, sold, or butchered, because it was fitting that he should be sacrificed in the interests of the state.

THEN AND NOW.

We read our own short history and are astonished to realize how trifling the affairs of an everyday life a century and a half ago would seem to us now. The agriculture of the revolution would now seem like the work of a child.

The manufactures of that day were conducted by men who perfected the skill of their hands and who, with lifelong patience and a degree of humble pride, worked to the end of their lives in their accepted and lowly station. Here and there one of the puny ships that braved the sea in those days remains to convince us of the unconquerable courage of man. The grinding labor with which the poor eked out a hungry existence has given place to a nobler effort full of prophecy of the day when the perfection of science will all but equalize every form of human endeavor and when labor may be the most profitable of all vocations.

Why should we multiply words to describe what is about us, and above all things why should we boast of it when we realize that it has practically been left to us and that it represents more than a century of a noble and unselfish struggle to improve the condition of mankind. With all of this progress, can we not discover some new way of disposing of the questions that may vex the world without resorting to arms?

CONQUERORS OF NATURE.

We have, in a measure, conquered nature. This is a noble conquest and has, in a measure, satisfied our honest pride. Will we leave our task and go back and take our place alongside the predatory barbarians of antiquity and proclaim that conquest and force are the inevitable inheritance of the human race?

There is something in a centennial anniversary which causes men to reflect and think. One hundred years ago the great Napoleon, after having been overwhelmed by the combined armies of Europe, was a prisoner on the island of Elba. All Europe was in arms. In the United States nearly half a million of men were organized to resist the invasion of the forces of Great Britain. All at once, in the course of a year, peace was declared, and for nearly half a century afterwards there was comparative peace throughout the world. The third and fourth generations have come since that time, and our thoughts go back to the mighty struggles of a hundred years ago. We understand Napoleon better now than did the generation in which he lived. Perhaps a hundred people read carefully his life and its purposes now for the one who knew the facts in his time. We have not only studied his life and his achievements but we have gone back and have read the history of other men whose purposes were similar to those of Napoleon.

SPARTA LEFT NOTHING TO THE WORLD.

The most impressive and significant thing about warrior nations is that they leave absolutely nothing to the generations that come after them. In all the history of men the people of Sparta stand first in the perfection of military discipline. While there were but few of them, they were the greatest military nation that the world has ever known.

Can anything be more impressive than the fact that the ancient Spartan left practically nothing to the world? They left a few names that endure, like Leonidas and Thermopylæ. They put the word "laconic" into the dictionary to describe the short speech of the soldier of Laconia. Imaginative historians recite a few incredible instances of their stoicism. Perhaps some schoolboy has wept over Thermopylæ. From all the history of Sparta the world can claim no inheritance except the inspiring memory of battles that were lost or won. They wrought neither in bronze nor in marble; they erected no great permanent public work; they wrote no classic history; they wrote no poetry; they left no relic but the corroded weapons that are exhibited in the museums of great cities. How different was the rival city of Athens, whose work in architecture, literature, and art still remain the envy and the glory of the world. Alexander the Great left nothing but a legacy of trouble; and when we go to the tomb of Napoleon we see no reference to any permanent work that he left to his people, but surrounding it is mausoleum is the roll of his victories, for his glory rests upon the memory of Marengo, Austerlitz, Jena, and a dozen other tremendous struggles, none of which had the effect of making any great or permanent change for the better, either in the history of his country or in the progress of the world.

SHALL WE TURN BACK?

When we turn away from these pages and reflect, should we not fairly ask ourselves, What would it profit us to go forth on a career of conquest? The conquered hates the conqueror. Have we an ambition to go out into the world and promote hatred? Can we work miracles of progress along every other line and then go back and stand with Cæsar in our attitude toward the world? Have we a new thought on every other subject, and yet insist on the same diplomacy that was practiced in the time of Solomon? As one who has read history with whatever of capacity he had to understand it, and in most cases not without pain, I have the happiness to feel that the United States has now turned away from the ancient precedents that were old in the time of the Pharaohs, and that we have set our faces toward the future with the hope of promoting peace throughout the world.

THE MAN AT THE HELM.

We have the good fortune to have at the head of the Government a man who has brought to this great task a wealth of varied and deep learning, a conscience that is not the growth of yesterday—not a frame of mind conjured up to suit the occasion of serving as President, but which is the reward of the patience and self-discipline of a noble life.

A HERO OF DEFEAT.

He has brought with him and placed at his right hand in the service of this Government one who stands alone in the history of American statesmanship.

Other men have suffered defeat and lapsed into obscurity. Disappointment has so stricken the vanity and the pride of others that hope fled from their hearts, and they were seen on the stage of action no more. You may search the history of ancient and modern times, and you will find but one for whom defeat served every purpose of victory, and who had more power and influence in private life, in the government of his country, than any other man had at the same time in the highest councils of the Nation. It is an instinct of human nature to humiliate further those we have defeated and to crush and trample those we have overthrown. The Secretary of State is the first character in history who has firmly united to himself in public esteem and affection a great people that rejected him for their leader. Defeat has only added to the unconquerable purpose of this man, who has proven that an office is a mere gift, sometimes capriciously given by the people, but that a place in the hearts of the world is the imperishable glory of the truly great man. And these two great leaders of the American people have patiently and scientifically gone about the task of abolishing bloodshed and war.

Deeply impressed as they are with the dignity of the human race and its hope of final perfection, they have asked the nations the question, "Should not the rule of reason prevail in all the acts of men?"

REASON MUST RULE.

The law of every civilized land demands that every sane adult person will be held responsible for his unreasonable acts that injure anyone else. Nearly all the wars that have ever been waged since the beginning of time were begun on the first impulse of national passion, when reason was dethroned and patriotism run mad, demanded to be led against the enemy. Whoever asked for calm deliberation was scouted or mobbed. No wonder the ancients imagined that there was a god that presided over panic and over war and over many of the violent impulses that are manifested by a mass of people. There is no horror more unimaginable or indescribable than a whole nation in anger clamoring for battle and bloodshed. Calmly, gently, the President and the premier have set to work to put forth the power and influence of a Nation of a hundred million people against the ancient vice of giving expression to national wrath. Already they have entered into treaties of peace with 16 of the nations, and have agreed upon a system of composing differences and strife that will mark an era in history.

In these treaties it is provided that—

The high contracting parties engage to submit for investigation and report to a commission, to be constituted according to the provisions of the following article, all differences of whatever nature they may be which may occur between them which can not be composed by diplomatic methods or are not submitted to a tribunal of arbitration; they bind themselves not to declare war nor to open hostilities during the examination by the commission and before the commission has presented its report.

And further that—

Each country, by means of its Government, chooses two members—one from among its own subjects, the other from among those of a third State—the two Governments, after agreement, will name the fifth member, on condition, however, that he be not a citizen of either of these two countries. Each commissioner shall hold his place during a term of four years; at the expiration of this term, or in the event of vacancy, the confirmation or the substitution of the commissioner, whose term may have expired or whose place may be vacant, shall be made in the same manner.

If all efforts under the provisions of these treaties fail, and, as a last resort, it is provided that—

The high contracting parties reserve to themselves the right to act independently on the subject matter of the dispute after the commission shall have presented its report.

WHAT IS PERSONAL SHOULD BE NATIONAL.

Whoever has taken part as a juror, or in a professional capacity in the trial of a case, where the defendant was charged with murder, and where his defense was that he acted upon sudden and sufficient provocation, will understand the deep meaning that is put into the words:

They bind themselves not to declare war nor to open hostilities during the examination by the commission and before the commission has presented its report.

THE COMMON LAW.

In the case of one charged with homicide, the defendant is held accountable for a greater degree of guilt, if he had time for reason to resume its sway before he took human life. If he had what is called "cooling time" in the simple phraseology of the common law, and then killed the person that had provoked him, he would be held guilty of murder. Under the provisions of these treaties there will be time for national anger to cool and for wise counsel to prevail. Four other nations have practically agreed to accept the terms of similar treaties.

WE ARE SAFE.

Intrenched as we are, with a great ocean on each side of us, with no possibility and evidently no purpose on the part of any nation to attempt to invade us, can we not live in hopes that some day we can dispense with the tremendous expenditures for armies and navies, with which we are now burdened? With treaties containing these beneficent and wise provisions, entered into with the nations of the world, it is inconceivable that we could be drawn into any great war. The world has been so materialistic that it has glorified war above peace; that it has cast into bronze the soldier with uplifted saber while it has left unhonored the heroes of moral victory, who made peace without war. The triumph of the soldier is to secure peace for his country at frightful cost. Can we not hope that it is the new glory of our statesmanship that we can secure permanent peace without any cost?

MEXICO.

The American people, under the leadership of the President and the Secretary of State, are now, with sublime patience, seeking to put into practice in our relations with the Republic of Mexico the principles of this new diplomacy.

Mexico is the victim of a mesalliance. The Caucasian race conquered the Mexican Indian, mixed and mingled with him, and bred a race that has inherited all the vices and misfortunes of both. It is a race in its infancy. The Mexican is a primitive man. The great example of the United States in establishing a republic misled the Latin American into believing that he also was fitted to work at the tremendous task of self-government. In the course and progress of government in Mexico the native Mexican has been robbed of all his goods, both real and personal. He has no place that he can call his own. The land of his fathers has been parceled out among unscrupulous usurpers and adventurers from different parts of the world, as well as among the grandees of his own country. He is a slave in the hands of an unscrupulous master. He is sold as a chattel for debt. He is scourged for failing in his task, and driven away when the period of his servitude is ended, only to fall into the hands of another master.

THE MAN WITHOUT A HOME.

It is in the nature of man to love a home. He is without dignity if there is no place that he can call his own. It is one of the natural yearnings of humanity to have a sense of dominion over some spot of earth. To be deprived of it and to live a nomadic life is wholly inconsistent with civilization. All of these misfortunes have come to a people in the latitude of the Tropics. In the history of man, no people in the Tropics have attempted self-government except the people of Latin America.

NO MIDDLE CLASS.

No people have ever flourished without a middle class. The partnership of prince and peasant may have succeeded in past ages, but in our time and during the past century it has been a lamentable failure. Without this middle class, and with the incongruous relation of prince and peasant, Spain lost her Empire; and when her Empire was lost, even the Spanish aristocrat, whose pride would not permit him to become utterly ignoble, was not left with the people of Latin America, but in his place came the bandit, the freebooter, and the adventurer.

LED BY ADVENTURERS.

Mexico presents the horrible spectacle of a nation of ignorant peons led by contending groups of remorseless and desperate characters whose purpose is plunder and whose highest ambition is to usurp by force the places of power in that so-called Republic. The native Mexican, having nothing to lose and perhaps the remote chance or a specious promise of something to gain, follows the leader that is nearest to him and who is able to pay him for his military service.

OUR DUTY.

In the presence of this situation, what is our duty in Mexico? There are those who say that we owe it to civilization to occupy Mexico with the military forces of the United States and establish stable government there until such time as the Mexican people will come to a realizing sense of their duty to each other.

TEACHING WITH THE BAYONET.

In other words, that we should undertake to teach the Mexicans self-government at the point of the bayonet. Then, after having taught the Mexican this valuable lesson, it will be our duty to withdraw our forces from Mexico and allow the thoroughly instructed Mexican to proceed with the establishment of self-government. It is believed by a part of our people that if a share of the Mexicans were killed by American soldiers the survivors would learn how to conduct a Government. There are also those of our people who believe that we ought to enter upon the complete occupation and permanent conquest of Mexico and annex it to the United States. They affirm that the Monroe doctrine makes the Government of the United States responsible for the peace and good order of the whole American continent and that whenever a condition of chaos exists in any of the Latin-American Republics it is our duty to proceed to the conquest of the country that is in a state of revolution. We have among us those who favor pacification by force and those who favor absolute conquest.

Separate and apart from these is the great mass of the American people, always ready to manifest that they are not wedded to the past but are willing to demonstrate to the world that they are as progressive in their notions of international relations as they are in every other phase of American life. They believe that conquest is unworthy of the American people. They judge rightly that the crowning glory of the American is that he has become the conqueror of the forces of nature instead of the conqueror of men.

Sixty-nine years ago our people regarded Mexico somewhat in the light of an equal. When a dispute arose with Mexico they felt as though the national honor was at stake. Mrs. John A. Logan, in her reminiscences, describes with great literary skill the scene as she witnessed it in southern Illinois, when the long delayed news reached the people that war had been declared with Mexico. The people assembled, flags waved, drums were beating, and ambitious orators were loudly appealing to the patriotism of young men. Few people knew and no one cared what the issue was. There was a prospect of a fight and an opportunity for glory.

THE COST.

What a marvelous change in the people in two generations! We now hold that it is not our honor that is questioned, but that it is our patience that is taxed. The mass of the people are not clamoring for the invasion or the conquest of Mexico. We know the cost of war. We would not fasten upon ourselves the burden, from the standpoint of taxation alone, of paying pensions, bounties, claims, and the tremendous cost of conducting military campaigns, all of which would not be paid in the next century, even to acquire Mexico as a business proposition. From a moral standpoint we revolt at the thought of staining the American flag with the blood of a people that have not attacked or invaded us as a nation—a people that are the victims of their own misfortunes. From a practical standpoint it would seem that if shooting down people can teach the science of self-government the Mexicans, at the present rate of progress, will finally attain that end themselves.

WE WILL COMPEL RESPECT.

We have compelled respect for the flag in Mexico. We have demanded and exacted the protection of lives and property of American citizens.

A REAL SOLDIER.

We have on the soil of Mexico a brigade of highly disciplined and efficient troops commanded by Brig. Gen. Funston, a practical soldier, who is a graduate of no military school, but who learned the science of war under fire. I believe that he could march his troops into the City of Mexico practically unopposed. Our Navy is on both coasts of Mexico. We are ready and willing to maintain the honor of the United States and to protect our people, but we are willing to wait with the utmost patience in the hope that order may be restored in Mexico.

THE CROWNING ACHIEVEMENT.

If the man who at present usurps the office of President of Mexico is compelled to retire without further bloodshed, if a President is elected under the constitution of Mexico, if the contending forces that are distracting that unfortunate country will lay down their arms, and the people of Mexico, in the security of peace, can proceed to work out the reforms that are necessary for the welfare of that unfortunate people, and our troops and sailors can come home with only the loss of a score of glorious lives and the honorable wounds of a few more—if this can be accomplished by the efforts of the President and the Secretary of State it will stand alone, isolated and detached, in the history of nations as the greatest diplomatic victory of all time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago, on account of false alarms sounded by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] regarding business conditions in this country, I nominated him as the mouthpiece of calamity howlers, the prophet of civic evil, chairman of the committee on political distress, and the self-constituted forerunner of business destruction. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman in reply, during my absence, suggested that my speech was unmarred by a single thought, and yet the gentleman himself was the subject of my remarks. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman alluded to personal bearing and voluptuous verbosity. [Laughter.] I shall make no comment upon the personal pulchritude of the gentleman from Washington, for that, fascinating and charming as it is, is something that he can not help. [Laughter.] Be it said to the credit of the gentleman that he is now doing all in his power to cover up and hide as much of it as possible, and he is to be commended for this, since whiskers are on the free list. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman made some observations about my peculiar style of oratory. Well, Mr. Speaker, there are so many styles of oratory in the House that I hardly know which to adopt as my model or standard; but I can assure the gentleman from Washington that his peculiarly rare and fascinating style is in no danger of infringement from me. [Laughter.]

Then, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman indulged in euphonious phrase when he had me "sailing around on the suffrage sea." How beautiful and poetic, Mr. Chairman—sailing on the suffrage sea! [Laughter.]

It is both interesting and amusing to me, Mr. Chairman, to see the gentleman from Washington come out from his hiding and break his long silence to submit a few observations on suffrage and the suffrage sea. The gentleman launched his little suffrage batteau, armed with palm-leaf paddle, and perspiring now at every pore, he is rowing on the suffrage sea—just before the congressional election. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Silent so long on the subject of woman suffrage, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman remembers that his colleague [Mr. BRYAN], as State senator in the State of Washington, was instrumental in submitting to the people of that State the proposition of woman suffrage, and, too, he recalled the fact that in the House a few days ago the selfsame gentleman made some remarks in favor of woman suffrage, and now, all of a sudden, in sheer desperation, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] vacates the panic-haunted halls of the interests and quits, temporarily, the imaginary shores of business disaster and launches his frail and hitherto untried bark on the suffrage sea. [Laughter.] Let me paraphrase the figure of Ulysses. When the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] discovered his colleague [Mr. BRYAN] sailing on the suffrage sea and found that he was regarded as an old sea captain on the suffrage sea he exclaimed, "Push off, and sitting well in order, smite the sounding furrows, for my purpose holds to sail beyond the suffrage stars and far out on the suffrage sea before the next congressional election." [Laughter.] Leonidas at Thermopylæ, Cæsar beyond the Rubicon, and Napoleon at Austerlitz never displayed such daring and heroism as did the gentleman from Washington in boldly declaring his position on woman suffrage long after opposition to the cause had ceased in his State and the thing itself was an accomplished fact. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, this hero of many unfought battles in the cause of woman suffrage now "nails the flagstaff to the mast and sets every threadbare sail, then gives it to the god of storms, the lightning, and the gale." And yonder he goes, Mr. Chairman, braving dangers and hardships just before the congressional election, sailing on the suffrage sea. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, three months prior to granting women the right to vote in the State of Washington a resolution indorsing woman suffrage was submitted to a Republican State convention. The gentleman from Washington was there when that resolution was overwhelmingly defeated. Not only that, Mr. Chairman, but the gentleman made a speech to that convention, but nowhere in that speech can there be found a single reference to suffrage or "the suffrage sea." In that speech the gentleman said, "Let us unfurl the banner of Republicanism," but the banner of woman suffrage never floated across his vision, nor did he even hint at a voyage on the suffrage sea. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

OUT IN THE STATE OF WASHINGTON.

The way was dark and dank
When the Repubs beat the plank
For suffrage by the suffrage sea.
HUMPHREY was demure
When not quite so sure
About suffrage and the suffrage sea.

[Laughter.]

But now just see him walk,
Or even hear him talk
(Within the last week or two),
And he is the author of the suffrage sea.

[Laughter.]

One time he acted queer,
And he didn't talk so clear
About suffrage or the suffrage sea.
But now he's in a tight,
And he shows a fearful fright,
Displays it day and night,
About suffrage and the suffrage sea.

[Laughter and applause.]

For BRYAN, his running mate,
Has been sailing here of late,
About on the suffrage sea.
So now he takes a stand,
Hoping 'twill command
Votes for him on the suffrage sea.

[Laughter.]

He's as cunning as a hawk,
But he's just now learned to talk
Suffrage and the suffrage sea.
He's been silent now so long
That his belated suffrage song
Sounds lonely on the suffrage sea.

[Laughter and applause.]

But he wants the bees to hum
When he beats his suffrage drum
For reelection by the suffrage sea.

[Laughter.]

How easy 'tis to sail
When people say "All hail
To suffrage and the suffrage sea."
His deceptive ammunition
'Gainst woman's intuition
Will be puny on the suffrage sea.

[Laughter.]

They'll greet him with a song,
And it won't be very long
Till he'll hear it on the suffrage sea.
And this is the song they'll sing unto thee,
Sailing on the suffrage sea:
"So long thou hast kept us waiting
That we thought thou never wouldst come."

[Laughter and applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, having replied to the speech of the gentleman from Washington [laughter], I shall proceed to discuss some of his gloomy outcroppings regarding panical prospects and business disturbance.

Mr. Chairman, something is radically wrong with the gentleman from Washington. He has become very morose here of late, and he has gone from bad to worse, down this sorrowful road of gloomy forebodings, until I fear that he is coming to be very much like an old fellow down in my State.

He was always complaining. Things were always out of joint, and he was always grumbling and growling. One day a gentleman, who used to know "Old Bill," as the neighbors called him, asked, "Where is Old Bill now?" The answer was, "Why, he is over there, growling as usual. He's done got now to where he don't enjoy anything but eating sour horse apples and sitting up with a corpse." [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, things are all out of joint to the gentleman from Washington. He has become a chronic croaker, and if he keeps up this croaking, it is certain that the day is not far distant when Old Bill will be called on to sit up with his political corpse in the Seattle district in the State of Washington. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I saw the gentleman in this House when his party was in power in every branch of the Government. He had every opportunity possible then to vote for remedial measures, but, like his party, the gentleman has persistently and insistently voted to increase the power of a favored few and against measures in the interest of the masses. He has voted for measures that taxed necessities and placed luxuries on the free list. Like his party, he has been the friend of privilege, the exponent of class legislation, and the faithful friend of the trusts, and now he criticizes the fearless and faithful democracy of this administration for striking from the limbs of labor, commerce, and industry the shackles forged upon them by the Republican Party. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, if I wanted a man in this country to lead a charge against intrenched privileges and plutocracy, I would never select the gentleman from Washington; but if I wanted a man who had served the privileged classes, one peculiarly suited to the disgusting task of exaggerating notices of business disturbance, to the delight of trust magnates and tariff barons, I would turn with unerring precision to the gentleman from Washington and say: "Thou art the man." [Applause on the Democratic side.] Some of the big crooks and criminals of the country are anxious to have Congress adjourn before their cases are reached in the legislative program. They have hung out distress signs and sounded panic signals in their efforts to frighten business and force an adjournment of Congress, but the President and the members of his party in Congress have gone on passing laws in the interest of the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In my judgment, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Washington mistakes the attitude of his own constituents when he believes that they will stand for the tactics that he is employing here to embarrass and misrepresent the President of the United States. I do not believe that the patriots dwelling in the district of the gentleman indorse his efforts to frighten legitimate business and induce a few indignant plunderers of the people to believe that the time is opportune for them to bring on a panic.

Mr. Chairman, I indulge the prophecy that when Congress adjourns and the gentleman returns to the district that he now represents he will find that his course while Congress was engaged in passing important legislation was not and is not approved by the thoughtful and patriotic people at home. [Applause on Democratic side.] I venture to suggest to the gentleman that he will find that the great majority of patriotic Americans living in his district are in full sympathy with this great Democratic President in his efforts to free this country from the curse of trusts and monopolies. He will find that the people are looking beyond the footlights where the partisan performer is playing for political advantage—that they are thinking of the welfare of their children and their children's children—that they are saying in their heart of hearts "God bless the President and long like the Republic." [Applause on the Democratic side.] Yes, Mr. Chairman, when the record of his conduct here at a time when sinister interests were throwing every obstacle possible in the way of just legislation and trying to hamper and hinder the President in bringing relief to the American people is laid bare before the people of Washington that record will be obnoxious and revolting to them. Then they will say to the gentleman "You had the opportunity to support and sustain the President in his battle for the plain people but you chose to criticize and slander him. You had the opportunity to serve your country but you chose to serve the interests instead." Then, when the gentleman is greeted with the frown of their condemnation instead of the smile of their approval, he can say, truthfully, "Without warrant or excuse I have brought it all on myself. The thorns that I have reaped are of the tree that I have planted. They have torn me and I bleed." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, they will say to the gentleman from Washington, "When the President was storming the breastworks of intrenched privilege, when he was driving the enemies of the Republic from the temple of the people, when he stood with drawn sword smitting monopoly hip and thigh you might have conveyed to him a message of approval and good will from the people of Washington; you might have said a word of encouragement as he battled with the forces of greed and avarice."

But no, Mr. Chairman, he brought no friendly message and spoke no kindly word. Where was the swarthy knight of Washington, with his raven's plume? He was standing on the ramparts of the opposition, contributing munitions of war and otherwise giving aid and comfort to the enemy. There he stood, trampling upon the flag of equal rights and waiving the banner of special privilege. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Washington says that Democrats here are doing the bidding of the President. I want to say to the gentleman that I had rather follow the chosen head of a hundred millions of people; I had rather follow the leadership of a man who has bared his breast to the enemies of his country, fighting for what he knows is best for his countrymen; I had rather follow Woodrow Wilson up the mountain side over the flinty paths of difficulty and the jagged rocks of privilege to the mountain summit of the new freedom than to be the pliant tool and handy instrument of evil in the hands of the enemies of my country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Washington has had to do with a panic, and he knows something about panics. He ought to be authority on the subject, since he and his party brought one on us in 1907. It came like a thief in the night, with no more warning than a thunderclap from a clear sky. There was no excuse under God's heaven for it. Good crops abounded all about us. It came after 10 years of control by the Republican Party. What did the gentleman from Washington say about that panic? Why, here is his speech. He said that there was not much excuse for it. He said it was a panic of unfounded fear, a panic that was brought upon us because of lack of confidence of the people in banks.

Mr. Chairman, what does it take to shake and shatter confidence? The very thing that the gentleman from Washington has been doing here for the last two or three weeks tends to disturb confidence and excite fear. It takes such conduct as the gentleman has been engaging in here to disturb business and shake faith in the business institutions of America. The gentleman says "Unfounded fear." Have we got anything like that now? What is the gentleman trying to do but fan into flame the embers of unfounded fear? It may be that the gentleman wants to see a panic now like the Republican panic of 1907. He doubtless wants to be able to say that "the Republicans produced a panic in 1907 and the Democrats produced one, with my aid, in 1914, just seven years later." [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to make a correction in the gentleman's speech made in 1909, I believe. There is a typographical error in it. He goes on to say "This was a panic of plenty." Oh, what a delightful panic—"panic of plenty." I want to strike out "of" and insert "a," so that it will read "It was panic aplenty." [Laughter.] That is what we had under the Republican administration. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The gentleman's party was in power in every branch of the Government. What happened then? Why, a man who had accumulated money could not get it out of the bank. They locked the door under Republican rule, and when the poor man called for his own money to buy bread for his little ones, they said, "It is yours, but you can not get it." That panic was the fruit of the Republican Party, and by their fruits ye shall know them. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This panic talk of a few Republicans has caused some timely things to be written and said. J. Kee Maxwell, in the Peoria Journal, has contributed the following poem:

SAD, VERY SAD.

Day in, day out, he moans and sighs
And shakes his head in doubt;
His sorrow he can not disguise,
The country's down and out.

The workingman is on the bum;
It surely is a crime
To make a fellow being glum—
They work him overtime.

[Laughter.]

And lo, the humble farmer guy,
His lot is worse by far;
It takes two loads of wheat to buy
A 1915 car.

The railroads are in dire distress;
Ah, brethren, it is tough!
For in dejection they confess
They haven't cars enough.

The bankers, too, are stricken sore;
When harvest time begins,
With one accord they'll raise a roar—
And build more money bins.

Small wonder that this patriot
Should be so heavy souled;
A pesky Democrat has got
The job he used to hold.

[Laughter.]

How comforting it must be to the gentleman from Washington to be constantly carrying around messages of gloom and despondency. How sweet must be the occupation of dispelling confidence and hope with doubt and uncertainty.

Our country has been sorely afflicted by Republican rule. Individual enterprise and industry have been hampered and crippled. Commerce has been fettered and competition practically destroyed. The patient was suffering with many disorders when the great physician of economic ailments—the Democratic Party—took charge of his case. The treatment was completely changed. Republican belts and bandages, that cramped the muscles and hindered circulation, have all been removed by the Democratic doctor. Trust pills and tariff ointments have all been discarded and the patient is recovering rapidly. In fact, he says that he is almost well, and he is really looking well—so much better than he did under the old treatment of the Republican Party.

But when nearly everybody is happy over the improved appearance of the patient, the gentleman from Washington is whispering in his ear that he looks mighty thin and that the prospects are he will die.

The gentleman has his counterpart in many communities of the country. I have in mind now an old bad-news peddler that my friend Preacher Brannan, in my district, told me about. He said that there was an old settler just over in east Alabama who made it his business to haunt the bedside of the sick and to relate to the suffering one all the miserable and melancholy things that he could remember—and he remembered them all—about people that he had seen suffer and die. One day this old bad-news peddler called to see Nat Jenkins. Nat, of course, was sick, but the old fellow never heard of it before. So as soon as he was comfortably seated at the bedside of Nat he looked sorrowfully at him and said, with a voice from the tomb, "Nat, old fellow, you are looking mighty bad." Whereupon Nat said, "I feel a whole lot better, and the doctor says I am improving right along now." "Yes," said the old fellow, "but doctors don't know everything. I tell you that you are a mighty sick man, and my opinion is that you are not long for this world. How long have you been sick?" "Eight days," said Nat. "Yes," said the old man mournfully, "the ninth day always tells the tale. It's the fatal time. Bill Johnson was afflicted just like you are, and Bill died on the ninth day." [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Washington seems to enjoy the office of chronic kicker and bad-news peddler. He comes with his nostrums and joy-killing implements spreading gloom and despondency wherever he goes.

But the gentleman is relying too seriously on the power of his office, and he has overestimated his ability to wreck the car of Democratic progress and prosperity now moving through the country.

This mighty car is freighted with the rights and liberties, the hopes and expectations of the greatest nation of people on the globe, and the gentleman can no more stop it or impede its progress than did the little ant the great railroad train. He got on the rail of the railroad track and stood up on his hind legs and said, "In order to show my power and prowess I am going to wreck this train. When the engineer sees me he will be frightened half to death. Then he will blow his whistle loud and long. Then the conductor will put his head out of the window, see me reared up on my hind legs, and when he does he will give the alarm to the passengers in the train, and consternation will reign as they realize that certain death awaits them." [Laughter.] But, Mr. Chairman, the train came thundering along. The engineer did not even lower his eyes to the spot where the ant so bravely stood. The conductor never put his head out of the window, and not a passenger was disturbed. The train sped on, and the only thing that was left to tell of the folly of the ant was a greasy spot on the rail. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Let the gentleman from Washington, before it is everlastingly too late, profit by the example of the ant.

Mr. Chairman, in that speech he charges the present administration with closing mills and factories in great numbers. Let us see how his charge tallies with the facts of the situation. I have obtained from the Department of Commerce statistics which show that the number of cotton spindles in operation in the United States May 31, 1913, was 30,556,000, and that on the same date for 1914 more than 31,000,000 spindles were in operation in this country. Let me quote from a high authority on this subject as to the State of New Hampshire:

I have been in New Hampshire recently and I could not learn of a single cotton mill or woolen mill or textile mill of any kind, pulp mill or paper mill that had closed.

This statement, Mr. Chairman, is from the junior Senator from New Hampshire, Senator HOLLIS.

What says New Jersey in reply to the gentleman from Washington concerning closed mills and factories?

The Singer sewing-machine plant at Elizabeth, N. J., employs 10,000 hands. When we put the products of that plant on the free list, Republican croakers said that with sewing machines on the free list the plant would go dead; but not so. It has long been the custom of this plant to shut down for one month during the summer for repairs and other purposes; but this year the company has notified its workmen that they could have only one week; that sewing machines had been sold so rapidly and that orders were coming in so fast that they could not afford to close shop more than a week this year.

What says the South to the charge of closed mills and factories? L. W. Parker, president of the Parker Cotton Mills Co., and the head of 18 southern cotton mills, says:

The textile industry is not threatened by foreign competition, and the outlook for all business the country over is bright.

How about the woolen industry? While mills are shutting down and factories are closing in the imagination of the gentleman from Washington the Cleveland Worsted Mills Co., of Ohio, has increased its capital stock from $3,000,000 to $10,000,000, and in doing so it makes the following statement:

Recent tariff legislation has brought about a change in business conditions in connection with our industry. It will become necessary for the company to enlarge the volume of business, thereby requiring additional manufacturing facilities.

[Applause on Democratic side.]

While the hallucination of panics and business disturbance rages in the mind of the gentleman from Washington, Henry Kleine, of Chicago, president of the National Leather and Shoe Finders' Association, says "the business outlook is good and the West is jubilant." Then, from the Pacific slope, comes the testimony of S. J. Burtchaell, vice president of the National Leather and Shoe Finders' Association. Hear him, O ye of little faith from Washington. This is what he says:

The country and the country's business outlook never looked so well.

What says Rhode Island to the charge of closed mills and factories under the present administration? Mr. Speaker, from Burville, R. I., comes the answer:

With every woolen mill here running full time and some of them running day and night, business is better than it has been in 10 years.

What says Indiana to the closed-factory argument of the gentleman from Washington? From Elwood, Ind., comes the glad answer:

The tin-plate industry is in a flourishing condition. The tin-plate workers ride in their automobiles to the office of the paymaster to collect their wages. This city of 13,000 people has a pay roll of $146,000 a month.

And yet Republicans predicted that reducing the tariff tax 50 per cent on tin plates would kill the industry and starve its employees. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

What says Pennsylvania, the home of Pittsburgh, the industrial giant of the western world? What is her answer to the gloomy accusations of this disciple of disaster? From Altoona, the industrial center of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., comes the answer:

Every department of the Altoona shops is working full time and some of them are working overtime.

This city is enjoying an unsurpassed era of prosperity. There is the greatest activity in all business circles in Altoona, and leading business men declare that their record of business for 1914 will be ahead of anything done in years. In the face of these facts, if the gentleman from Washington will take some headache salts he can remove the last painful impression of shut mills and closed factories from his gloomy and melancholy brain. [Laughter.] The wayfaring man ought to be able to see by this time, Mr. Chairman, that there is no panic except a political panic in the gentleman's district. [Laughter.] Lord Byron says that "there is music in everything if men but had ears." And, Mr. Chairman, there are signs of industrial activity and business prosperity all about us if the gentleman from Washington only had eyes. But some people go through life, Mr. Chairman, blinded to its beauties and deaf to its music, groping among its shadows and murmuring its dolorous strains. They suffer from their disordered imaginations and miss a great deal in this world. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, when I hear the clang of hammers, the sound of the saw, the music of the woodman's ax, of falling trees, and the song of the sawmill; and when I hear the wind singing through the gates of morn, breathing balm in the ranks of the bending corn; and when I see millions of white and red cotton blossoms nodding welcome to the gold-belted bee; and when I see a bumper wheat crop pouring plenty into the elevators of the West; and when I see railroad trains moving the crops in the jubilee of transportation, and hear the hum of wheels and the roar of active industry all around me, I feel like asking the gentleman from Washington, Are you putting on for a purpose or are you both blind and deaf? [Laughter and applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman charges that this administration has driven mighty armies of men out of employment into idleness. Senator HOLLIS, of New Hampshire, says that labor has never been better employed in New Hampshire than it is to-day. Samuel Gompers, the tribune of organized labor in the United States, says conditions are improving, more men find work, and feeling of uncertainty is passing. The fact is disclosed that since the Underwood tariff bill went into operation wage earners for the first time have been able to purchase automobiles and ride in them when they go to collect their wages. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Then, again, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman says we have destroyed business. Let us put some witnesses on the stand and see whether or not we have been helping or hurting business. While the Republicans are flooding the country with pessimistic literature saying that the wool industry is ruined raw wool is bringing a better price than it did before the Underwood bill went into effect, and woolen mills are running full time, and both industries are enjoying prosperity. It is an interesting thing to note, Mr. Chairman, that not long ago the Wool Growers' Association of the United States met here in the city of Washington. They discussed ways and means to prevent sheep losses by wild animals, and they talked about how to lessen the evils of the sheep-killing dog, but not a word, Mr. Chairman, was said against the Underwood tariff law on wool. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Why? Because, as an Oregon newspaper correspondent says, the price being paid is the top notch to date for fine wool.

Up in Michigan a real estate man of 20 years' experience, whose business is building houses and selling them to workingmen on monthly payments, says that he has had more contracts this year than ever before and that initial payments were larger than any year of his experience.

Hear what Dover, N. H., has to say:

The Pacific Mills are installing 30,000 new spindles.

Does this look like we are hurting the business of New England? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Here is another calamity item for the gentleman from Washington; it comes from Indiana:

This summer 150 automobiles are being sold every day in Indiana, and most of them are going to the rural districts.

How sad is this information, Mr. Chairman. Every time the sun goes down on 150 of these sales in Indiana the people who buy them—they may not know it or mean anything by it—but they are seriously interfering with the panic-fraught arguments of the gentleman from Washington. [Laughter.]

Let us hear what West Virginia has to say to the mournful message of the gentleman from Washington. It will be remembered that standpat Republicans said that the Underwood tariff bill would ruin the steel industry of the United States, but instead of doing that it is inviting foreign capital into our country, for here at Charleston German capitalists have invested a million dollars in a steel plant to be erected here. It will employ American workingmen and manufacture steel in the United States. Does this look like the fruit of a discredited and doomed administration? No, Mr. Chairman, it is the directresult of constructive legislation. It is the blessed offspring of a tariff for revenue only. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Bring the smelling salts and have the camphor ready for the gentleman from Washington, for here is a blow like unto the one that struck Billy Patterson a long time ago. [Laughter.] A special from Stroudsburg, Pa., says:

A woolen mill which closed down here before the Underwood bill with free wool went into effect has now reopened with splendid business prospects.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

John V. Farwell Co., of Chicago, speaking of the wholesale dry-goods business, says that business is better than it was a year ago; that the volume of business in wool dress goods shows decided gain over a year ago.

The New York Times of July 12 says that building permits issued in June of this year compare quite favorably with those issued for the same month last year; that 75 leading centers in the United States, according to reports by Dun's Review, call for the expenditure of $72 000 000, as against $68,000,000 for the same month last year. Continuing, it says:

Among the cities where the most pronounced increases appear are Baltimore; Chicago; Seattle, Wash.—

And Seattle is the home of the gentleman. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Why, Mr. Chairman, can it be that this melancholy feeling has overtaken Seattle? Can it be that all this direful news of business disturbance is coming from the district of the gentleman? Can it be that Seattle, located in the glorious golden West is pining and whining in concert with the gentleman from Washington? I can not believe that they have any such conditions in that splendid, growing city of the West.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. Briefly.

Mr. BRYAN. However it may pain me to hear you commenting on my colleague in making those statements, I can not stand here and hear you make any statements in reference to the prosperity of Seattle. I assure you that everything up there is on the uplift, and everybody is happy. We are all encouraged by what has been done—the Alaskan railroad bill and the development of the Pacific coast——

Mr. HEFLIN. Praise God from whom all blessing flow. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the other gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY]?

Mr. HEFLIN. I can not yield now. Why, Mr. Chairman, it would be almost sacrilegious to yield just now. [Laughter.] Seattle is happy, and everybody is happy, except the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY]. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Standpat Republicans over there denounced the Democrats for putting sugar on the free list, and they said that the consumer would not be benefited by the reduction of the tariff on sugar.

Let us put Mr. Spreckels, president of the Sugar Refining Co. of New York, on the witness stand. Here is what he says:

It may be of interest to know that under the stimulus of the reduced tariff consumption in the Eastern States alone has increased practically 20 per cent. The consumption from March 1 to June 19, 1913, was 748,000 tons, and the consumption of sugar from March 1 to June 19, 1914, was 893,000, an increase over last year of 145,000 tons.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

"By their fruits ye shall know them." What have been the fruits of this Democratic administration? In the little manufacturing State of Connecticut, Fred P. Holt, bank commissioner, tells us that the total deposits in the savings banks of Connecticut October 1, 1913, were $307,000,000, and that the total deposits in the savings banks of that State on June 1, 1914, a period of only seven months from October, 1913, were $312,000,000. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The New York Times of July 12, this year, shows that the clearings for the United States as reported by the Financial Chronicle were, July 12, 1913, $2,968,000,000, and that on July 11, 1914, the amount had increased to $3,400,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, such news as this stampedes the standpatter and chokes the chronic croaker. The panic sought after and prayed for by the gentleman from Washington has failed to materialize. How mournful he looks as the grief-fraught winds of political disaster howl around the ruins of the G. O. P. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Washington complains that the present administration has sent out of the country more gold for a given length of time than any other administration has done. In 1904, under a Republican President, we exported that year $121,000,000 in gold, and in 1909, under another Republican President, we exported $132,000,000 in gold. The total amount of gold exported for five months, ending with May this year, is $35,000,000, and the total amount of gold imported—coming into the United States—for the same period of time was $26,000,000. The gentleman need not worry about gold now going out of our country to Europe. The cotton crop of my State alone will bring back all the gold exported to Europe this year before the 1st of December. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The New York Herald says that the value of the American crop this year will be $10,000,000,000, and that the $82,000,000 of gold exported to Europe since January 1 looks like loose change in comparison with these billions. [Laughter.] A $10,000,000,000 crop. Why, Mr. Chairman, that is twenty-five times the amount of the world's annual output of gold.

The gentleman from Washington complains that this administration has turned the balance of trade against us and that it is the first time such a thing has happened since the Wilson-Gorman tariff law of 1894. The gentleman ought to have known better, Mr. Chairman. There was no yearly balance of trade against us under the Wilson-Gorman law, but it is a fact that in 1909, under the reign of the Republican Party and a high protective tariff law, the three summer months gave a trade balance against us of $18,000,000, and the New York World says that in February, 1910, the balance of trade against us was $4,000,000, and that in March of the same year it was $19,000,000. The gentleman is exceedingly careless in his statement.

Let me read a notice about prosperity on the Pacific coast. From Los Angeles comes the cheering news of genuine prosperity. The Los Angeles Tribune says:

The fiscal year ended yesterday, and its termination served to spell prosperity for all of southern California. From every channel of finance, from the Government's sources of revenue, from the city's mart where money comes and goes, the clearing house, from the coffers of the merchants, small and large, come the tidings at the close of day that the period of time which commenced on the 1st day or last July has been richer and busier than at any other time in the history of the city.

Listen to what the Springfield Republican says:

Money has been cheap for months and the banks have had a great abundance to loan.

Mr. Chairman, from far-off St. Paul comes the happy message that never before in the history of St. Paul have the bank deposits touched $60,000,000, and never before have the assets been within $5,000,000 of the record established on June 30 this year. The June bank clearings here showed an increase of $10,000 000 over June 1, 1913. This figure is unprecedented in the history of the city. These signs of prosperity must be very displeasing and annoying to the gentleman from Washington as he goes about with his nostrums and joy-killing implements. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

The Philadelphia Record says that in the absence of some great calamity this country is assured of a prosperous 12 months. Let the gentleman from Washington shake off this hideous spell of gloom and despondency and lift his eyes toward the mountains of Democratic hope.

Mr. Chairman, there are many more things that I want to say, but my time is about out. I could speak at length giving these pleasant calamity items to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY]. [Laughter.] The gentleman has persisted in the work of calamity howling and chronic croaking until, I fear, he is going to be like the situation was with an old fellow at Montgomery, Ala. He had been engaged in fighting fermented millet juice for some time. [Laughter.] Finally his appetite craved limburger cheese. [Laughter.] He immediately went in search of it, and soon found some of high rank and smell. [Laughter.] He went into the store, tasted it, and asked the merchant how much of it he had. The merchant said, "I have 40 pounds of it." The old fellow said, "All right; give me all of it." [Laughter.] The merchant said, "You don't want that much?" The old fellow said, "Yes, I do; I want it to take home with me." [Laughter.]

So the merchant wrapped it up, and the old fellow took it and carried it down to the station. Everybody that he passed looked around, seized his nose, and quickened his step.

[Laughter.] That got on his nerves; and finally he went into an express office and walked up to the expressman's desk and said, "I want to ship this to Verbena." The expressman looked at him, seized a weapon, and ordered him to beat a retreat and beat it quickly. [Laughter.]

Then, the old fellow went out with his limburger, and he met a man on the street near the express office, and said, "Mister, they won't ship my cheese for me." Whereupon this gentleman, walking rapidly away, said "Go to an undertaker's establishment and buy a cheap casket, and ship it home as a dead friend." [Laughter.] He went to the undertaker's shop and bought a casket, and called old Uncle Rufus, a drayman, to carry his friend to the station. [Laughter.] The undertaker put the casket into the wagon, and the old fellow sat on the hind end by it. Uncle Rufus drove his little one-mule dray mournfully down to the station. [Laughter.] You know, in the old days they would not bury anyone soon after death, but kept them out for a long time. They said that sometimes people went off in a trance, and they did not want to bury them as dead, and then have the horror of thinking that they had only gone off in a trance. So, Mr. Chairman, as the old man and the drayman drove along, the wind came up pretty strong from the rear of the dray, and old Uncle Rufus, looking back and holding his nose, said "Boss, was your friend sick long?" The old fellow said "No." Then old Uncle Rufus said, "Well, you sho is got one good consolation, and dat is he hain't gone off in no trance." [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

So, Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] that if he does not let up on the tactics that he has been employing here for some time, if he does not refuse longer to be the vehicle in which threats of a panic to order are conveyed into this House, if he does not quit giving aid and comfort to the enemies of good government, it will not be long until he will find his political hopes in a ballot-swamped casket, and it will be no temporary interment. He won't be gone off in no trance. [Loud laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw that and yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of pleasure, if not with a great deal of profit, to the wordy oration of one of the White House pets. It may be said of his speech that it consisted of a great noise and stories that were both old and vulgar. [Laughter.]

Now, I want for just a moment to say to the gentleman that part of his speech I had heard my colleague [Mr. BRYAN] deliver before he gave it to the gentleman from Alabama. [Laughter.] I would suggest to my friend and colleague that he study the speech of Col. Roosevelt, recently delivered at Pittsburgh, in regard to the Underwood tariff bill. He does not agree with my colleague as to the blessings it has brought. I do not wonder that my colleague is anxious, having voted for that bill, to furnish evidence to some gentleman on that side to attempt to discredit me. He is certainly entitled to any glory he can get out of the fact of having voted for that Democratic tariff bill.

I did not hear the first part of the speech of my learned friend from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], but if it was like the last part I did not miss much, and it will not be necessary to answer it. But I want to refer to that part of his speech where he insisted that business is good.

First, he took up the question about the woolen schedule. I ask the gentleman why it was that the Crawford Woolen Mills, at Martinsburg, W. Va., went into the hands of a receiver week before last, if there is such great prosperity in the woolen industries? I would call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that during the first three months in 1914 our imports of woolen and worsted goods were $7,664,370. That is under a Democratic tariff law. During the first three months of 1913, under a Republican tariff law, they were $2,254,000, or a balance of $5,410,000, not in favor of the American, but in favor of the foreigner, in three months. What country is prospering under the Underwood tariff bill? Not our own. "Oh, but," said the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], "the outlook is splendid." Why not tell us something about the business conditions? The outlook is always splendid in Democratic eyes. I pick up to-day's Washington Post.

Let us see about this wonderful prosperity that my distinguished friend from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] is speaking about. On page 1 in the Post I read this statement—and I hope the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] will listen, and I will yield to him any time that he wants me to. I will not ask him questions and then dodge behind the privilege of the House to keep from being interrupted. I notify the gentleman now that he may break in whenever he pleases. This is the article in to-day's Post:

JOBS OF 1,000 MEN GONE—WAGES OF OTHERS ARE REDUCED AT THE BIG PLANTS IN WILMINGTON, DEL.

WILMINGTON, DEL., July 13.

The industrial depression has struck Wilmington with vigor. It was announced to-day by officials of the Harlan & Hollingsworth Corporation that 1,000 workmen have been discharged during the past few weeks.

The officials when asked declined to blame the Democratic administration for the condition. In addition, the Pennsylvania Railroad shops and the plant of the American Car & Foundry Co. have placed their employees on reduced wages. The repair shops of the Pullman Car Co. have also begun reducing their force.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Washington yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No. If the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] wants me to yield, I will yield to him, but not to the other gentleman. I see sitting by the side of my distinguished friend from Alabama the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP]——

Mr. BROCKSON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Washington yield to the gentleman from Delaware?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will not yield. I see sitting beside my friend from Alabama my learned friend from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP]. He is one of the men who has become almost hysterical because I said something about lack of prosperity in Indiana——

Mr. HEFLIN. The gentleman said he would yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not yield in the middle of a sentence.

Mr. HEFLIN. In the article you read just now, does not that gentleman say that that is not due to the Democratic tariff?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. He probably does not know any more about it than the gentleman from Alabama. And the very day that my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] made his prosperity speech, the largest factory in his district closed. It was rather unfortunate that he selected that particular time to orate on our wonderful business activity.

Mr. GILLETT. That speech may have been the cause of the factory closing down.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Then let me read a little more about the prosperity that under this Democratic administration is blessing the country. I hold in my hand an article from the Washington Post of July 10, which says:

FURNACES IN OHIO CLOSE—IRON PRODUCTION CUT FROM 52 TO 39 PER CENT IN A WEEK—FURTHER CURTAILMENT IN SIGHT WHEN THE UNION FURNACE GOES OUT OF BLAST IN AUGUST.

[Special to the Washington Post.]

CLEVELAND, OHIO, July 9.

The Daily Iron Trade says:

"Practically one-third of the merchant blast furnaces active in Ohio on July 1 were idle yesterday, a week later. The list of four furnaces, which were blown out the latter part of last week, was supplemented Tuesday, when Corrigan, McKenney & Co., of Cleveland, placed one of their river furnaces on the idle list. Furnaces which blew out last week were the Lawrence, of the Marting Iron & Steel Co.; the Hamilton, of the Hanging Rock Iron Co.; the Cherry Valley, of M. A. Hanna & Co., and one Wellston, of the Wellston Steel & Iron Co.

"Of 31 merchant furnaces in Ohio, 12 were producing pig iron on July 8, while 19 were out of blast. On July 1, 17 were active and 14 were idle.

"The Jisco furnace of the Jackson Iron & Steel Co., and the Norton, of the Norton Iron Works, of Ashland, Ky., joined the idle list in June. The present rate of blast-furnace operations among Ohio merchant furnaces is 39 per cent, compared with 52 per cent a week ago.

"The Union furnace, of Rogers, Brown & Co., which is one of the two active blast furnaces in the southern Ohio district, will go out of blast on August 1."

Here is another one taken from the press dispatches Saturday:

$1,000,000 STEEL COMPANY IN RECEIVER'S HANDS.

ALTON, July 11.

The Alton Steel Co., a million-dollar concern manufacturing hoop steel and cotton ties, is to-day in the hands of a receiver. The outstanding securities of the company are in the neighborhood of $1,250,000.

Inability to get a fair price for its product is given as the cause of the receivership.

Will the gentleman from Alabama please note that great prosperity? And I hold here in my hand another one, of July 2:

[From the Albany Journal, July 2, 1914.]

BIG CHATHAM PLANT MAY HAVE TO CLOSE—THREE BRANCHES HAVE SHUT DOWN, AND PRESIDENT W. C. WOODWARD IS DISGUSTED WITH BUSINESS INTERFERENCE.

The Chatham Shirt Co. is experiencing the dullest period in the history of the plant. At the Chatham factory the cutters are working on half time and the three outside factories at Keeseville, East Nassau, and Petersburg are closed. Orders never were so scarce as at the present time, and many concerns which contracted for shirts earlier in the season are endeavoring to cancel their orders. The company has withdrawn all its salesmen but one from the road, and it is probable that this man will also be withdrawn, inasmuch as he is finding it almost impossible to obtain enough orders to make his trips profitable. Neither wholesalers nor retailers are buying beyond immediate needs, and they all report that their business has very greatly decreased during the past few months.

At the Chatham plant the laundrymen are working nearly on full time, and the stitchers have been on full time thus far, inasmuch as a large quantity of cloth has been cut, and this will be made into shirts. The prospect is exceedingly discouraging, however, and unless there is a revival in business in the near future it will mean the partial or entire closing of the plant, thus throwing about 175 people out of employment. The total force at the three factories which have been closed is about 150.

W. C. Woodward, president of the company, believes the present administration's constant interference with business and the consequent turmoil and uncertainty to be at the bottom of these conditions. He believes if the railroads were granted the rate increase they ask for that business would improve. He believes every business man would be willing to pay this increase. Mr. Woodward thinks conditions will be still more unfavorable until election.

It is his opinion that the people are so thoroughly disgusted with the present state of affairs that they will welcome the opportunity to elect a Republican State ticket from governor down to the least important office on the ticket; also a Republican Congressman in this district. "They will not stand for this sort of thing much longer," said Mr. Woodward. "Every man I talk to is thoroughly sick of it, and if these conditions endure for six months you will see more failures in this country than were ever seen before. I know of Democrats who have voted the ticket for several years who say their eyes have been opened of late, and that they will have no further connection with that party."

I suppose, however, that the prospects are good for these closed mills. My friend from Alabama says so. I wish my friend from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] would read the daily papers. If he would do that instead of going to the Secretary of Commerce, he would find out something. This is from the Washington Post of to-day:

"HOLLAND" WRITES OF HUGE LOSSES BUSINESS HOUSES HAVE SUFFERED IN SIX MONTHS—EXPORTS ALONE HOLD OWN—ONE CORPORATION, IN A PRIVATE REPORT, FINDS THAT ITS BUSINESS DROPPED FROM $3,000,000 IN ONE-HALF OF 1912 TO ABOUT $900,000 FOR THE SAME PERIOD THIS YEAR—SOME OF THE REASONS OFFERED.

NEW YORK, July 13.

While the managers of many of the big industrial corporations think it inexpedient to report for publication what their business for the first half of the present calendar year was, measured in dollars, and compared with a like period in the previous year as well as in 1912, nevertheless some of them do tell in confidence what their recent experiences have been. For instance, one of the largest of American industrial corporations caused a comparison to be made on July 1 of the business done in the first six months of 1912, and then again the business of a like period of last year and also the business done in the six months which have just ended.

GREAT LOSS IN BUSINESS.

Their sales in a period of normal business activity approximate about $3,000,000 for six months. The total business done in the first six months of 1912 was a little under $3,000,000. The total business done last year in the same period was a little over $1,800,000. Their business for the first six months of the present year was, in round numbers, $900,000. Of course these managers look with apprehension upon a report of this kind.

A falling off such as these figures show can not be met much longer without compelling the managers of the industry to consider the expediency of liquidating or possibly of greatly reducing their capital.

DUE TO FOREIGN TRADE.

But perhaps the most interesting feature of this report—a report which in its general characteristics many of the other large industrial corporations have been reading somewhat anxiously, since their reports are of like tenor—is the fact that no small part of the business which was carried in the first six months of the present year was due to exportations. A statement of this kind is confirmed by the official statistics which were prepared by the Washington Bureau of Commerce. These authoritative figures show that although in the past eight months, which is the time that has elapsed since the new tariff law went on the statute books, the falling off in the money value of our exports, as compared with the like period in previous years, was nearly $146,000,000, yet only a little over 8 per cent of this falling off was in manufactured articles.

TARIFF DOES NOT AFFECT EXPORTS.

Apparently, either in spite of this tariff or because it plays no part in our exportation of manufactured commodities, we are practically holding our great foreign trade in manufactured articles. The reason is not far to seek, since the greater part of this trade is uninfluenced by the tariff, because those in other lands who buy these manufactured products are able to obtain most of them in the warehouses established by American industries in other lands. Much of our exportations of our manufactured products is with the countries from which we buy comparatively little.

The fundamental fact revealed by these confidential reports, which are confirmed in a measure by the statistics from Washington, is that there has been a woeful falling off in the United States in the demand for manufactured articles. The depression which our manufacturers are reporting is chiefly at home.

CAUSE FOR DROP IN EXPORTS.

Probably when detailed reports come from Washington it will be learned that much of the decrease of our export trade in the past eight months can be traced to the shortage of a part of our agricultural products last year, and particularly the unsatisfactory character of the harvest of corn.

The promise of stupendous crops this year, as well as the certainty of the harvest of some portion of them which is contained in the latest of the Government crop reports, justifies the expectation, so it is said in this city, that we are to make good in the fall and early winter of this year some part of the falling off in the exportations which have been observed since October 1 of last year up to July 1 of this.

The Washington authorities assume now that we shall be able to export perhaps as much as 250,000,000 bushels of wheat this year. If that expectation is fulfilled, we shall have exported about twice as much wheat this year as the average export of wheat for the past five years has been.

CROP A CURIOUS COINCIDENCE.

One of those curious coincidences of harvest times like that one which in 1896 caused a change of conditions which has become traditional seems likely again to be manifested this year. For, while there is now no doubt that the United States will harvest considerably over 900,000,000 bushels of wheat, nevertheless, in other parts of the world the promise is that there will be no more than an average crop, and in some countries considerably less than the average. Everyone who voted in the presidential election of 1896, and who shared in the interest of the campaign that preceded the election, will recall that, of a sudden, only about six weeks before election day, the market price of American wheat approached the dollar mark, although earlier it had been much less than this.

HIGH PRICES EXPECTED.

This occurred simultaneously with the continued fall in the price of silver, and thereby an object lesson was furnished to the farmers, or what they thought was an object lesson, which taught them that the constant depreciation of silver was not the cause of the low prices they were receiving for their wheat. The wheat fields of continental Europe yielded very small harvests, and when the grain factors of Liverpool and London learned authoritatively how small these harvests had been they began to make such imperative demands for American wheat as inevitably greatly to increase the price.

There came a few weeks ago from some parts of the West intimations that some apprehension prevailed in the agricultural districts lest the enormous harvest of wheat should cause considerable depreciation in price. The Washington authorities are in agreement with the experts of this city, who are persuaded that the unsatisfactory wheat harvest in other parts of the world will make it certain that American wheat will command satisfactory prices.

GREAT SOUTHERN CORN CROP.

There come intimations from other parts of the country that in some of the Southern States there are to be harvested enormous crops of corn. The development of the corn agriculture in some of the Southern States has been one of the striking features of American agriculture of the past 10 years. After all, it is the corn crop and the products which a great corn harvest make possible, such as meat, upon which the country must place its chief reliance for great increase in the exportation of food products. There comes from Washington an unusual statement intimating that in some parts of the West, on account of the scarcity of corn and the fact that wheat is being harvested plentifully, the farmers are feeding wheat to their live stock; and the Washington authorities estimate that possibly as much as 75,000,000 bushels of wheat will be utilized in this way That is a new thing to report.

HOLLAND.

That is some of the great prosperity that has been brought to the country by this new tariff law. I think my friend dwelt somewhat upon steel. I hold in my hand the Daily Iron Trade of Monday, July 6, in which I find the following:

LITTLE ACTIVITY IN IRON MARKET—SALES AND INQUIRIES CONFINED TO SMALL LOTS—PITTSBURGH MARKET SEEMS TO BE DIGESTING RECENT NEWS OF MERCHANT STACKS GOING OUT.

THE DAILY IRON TRADE,
NEWS BUREAU, 2148 OLIVER BUILDING,
Pittsburgh, July 6.

Pig-iron inquiry appears light and is confined largely to small lots of foundry and malleable grades, ranging from 500 to 1,000 tons. Actual sales are small also. Despite newspaper reports of inquiry for basic and Bessemer irons, little live open inquiry appears on the market to-day. Some sliding-scale tonnages may be quietly under negotiation, but traces of such business are difficult to find, leading to the belief that few such transactions are under way.

The Pittsburgh market seems to be digesting recently published information regarding merchant furnaces blowing out and planning to blow out, as well as others tying up with independent steel works projects. Prices have not changed in any particular.

I turn over another page of this Daily Iron Trade Review. I ask my Democratic friends to consider this. It shows the wonderful prosperity of the country. It is no wonder that my friend from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] feels called upon to come here and shout, "The outlook is splendid." But what about the conditions now? Listen to this, from the same paper:

ORE MOVEMENT IS OFF 40 PER CENT FOR THE PERIOD UP UNTIL JULY 1 AS COMPARED WITH CORRESPONDING PERIOD LAST YEAR.

The week opens with the lake fleet badly bunched at Lake Erie ports. The thick weather which prevailed during the latter part of last week caused many carriers to reach port too late to start unloading before the double holiday began on Saturday, with the result that Monday morning finds the docks congested. It will take a couple of days to work the fleet out and will throw a surplus of tonnage on the coal market. Several carriers were waiting for coal cargoes on Thursday last, and many of them will now have to go up light. There appears to be nothing in sight for the wild carrier as yet. No improvement is expected in the trade during July. The only activity so far has been in chartering grain for future loading, and the present surplus of tonnage has caused that rate to be shaded a bit.

Ore shipments during June were 5,502,367 gross tons as against 7,974,444 gross tons for June, 1913, a decrease of 2,472,077 tons. Up to July 1, 9,624,116 tons have been moved as against 16,125,042 gross tons for the corresponding period last year, a decrease of 6,500,926 tons. The movement is therefore 40 per cent less than it was for the same period last year. The movement to June 1, however, was more than 50 per cent less than that of last year, so that the trade is gaining a little headway. No material improvement is expected during July, but it looks now as though the low point of depression had been reached, and that one may expect a constantly increasing movement during the balance of the year. The outlook is somewhat more hopeful than it was a month ago, and a total movement of 37,000,000 tons for the season is now predicted. Following were the ore shipments during June and up to July 1, with corresponding data for last year:

Port.	June, 1913.	June, 1914.
Escanaba	845,414	580,103
Marquette	532,736	262,075
Ashland	774,761	541,315
Superior	2,377,078	1,997,895
Duluth	1,895,798	1,045,786
Two Harbors	1,548,727	1,075,193
Total	7,974,444	5,502,367
1914 decrease		2,472,077

Port.	To July 1, 1913.	To July 1, 1914.
Escanaba	1,800,601	1,076,020
Marquette	1,059,776	383,948
Ashland	1,509,702	883,081
Superior	4,677,349	3,733,502
Duluth	3,995,948	1,779,876
Two Harbors	3,081,666	1,767,689
Total	16,125,042	9,624,116
1914 decrease		6,500,926

This shows that the shipments of ore during the month of June just past were 40 per cent less than they were a year ago. How are we manufacturing such a great amount of steel products in this country, when the ore shipments are almost cut in two? The figures tell the true story.

I have another copy of the Daily Iron Trade Review, of July 8, a still later date. I want to read an item or two in this, which will be interesting:

GERMANS DEFEAT AMERICAN MAKERS—WIN SHEET ORDER BY AT LEAST $4 A TON MARGIN—SAME LOW PRICES SAID TO BE QUOTED EW YORK.

PHILADELPHIA, July 7.

In a recent test of competition for a good-sized order of steel sheets for shipment to Montreal as the stake, American makers were vanquished by German mills to the extent of at least $4 a ton.

The order, which called for a tonnage of No. 14-gauge blue annealed, was placed with German mills upon the basis of 1.40 cents f. o. b. Montreal. This price figures back to about 1.20 cents, Pittsburgh basis. The lowest price that it had been reported domestic producers had made on steel sheets in the present weakened market has not been below 1.30 cents, Pittsburgh, for No. 10 gauge. This price, it is said, is below the cost line, and it has been done only in certain cases. The German mills, as shown by this case, therefore have been able to take business at much below the dead line for the American sheet trade.

Prices approximating those named at Montreal are said to have been quoted by German makers in the New York market, although no sales of consequence yet have been traced to this source.

Sheet business with eastern mills is not active, but there is a fair run of miscellaneous orders, largely for early delivery. The leading eastern maker resumed at only part capacity this week after the holiday shutdown.

This shows how the American manufacturer under this new law was unable to get these orders, and they went to Germany.

That ought to receive applause on that side of the House. Then I turn inside, and I find, under the head of "Financial notes of iron and steel," it gives a long list of companies, including a large number of steel companies in the United States, too long to read, that have passed their dividends for the first time in many years. Does this show prosperity? I want to say to gentlemen on that side of the House that it does not make any difference how many speeches you make consisting of stories and adjectives, the truth is—and the figures show it—that the steel industry in this country is more than 40 per cent below normal, and steel is the great barometer of the business of the country.

Mr. Chairman, I am sorry I have not more time to reply to the prepared speech that my distinguished friend from Alabama has spent so many days laboring over. He has consumed an hour attempting to answer what I said in five minutes. I want to make this observation in closing: I believe that it is the right of the people in this country to know the truth. Let us have "pitiless publicity." I believe if business is bad, the people should know that. If business is good, they should know that fact. The truth should be put before the people until they can justly judge of the work of this administration up to this time. I stand on the floor of this House, and I assert that business is worse to-day than it has been at any time in 20 years, and I appeal to the public, to business men, to laboring men, to all classes throughout the country, as to whether or not I am stating the truth. Walk up and down the streets of this city, or any other city in the United States; stop and talk to men of all classes, and ask them whether or not business is good or bad. I am perfectly willing to trust my reputation both as a legislator and a man to the people of this country, when I stand on the floor of this House and declare that business is bad. The people are not to be long deceived; they know whether I am telling the truth or not. When the gentleman from Alabama stands up and says that business is good, that there is great prosperity, the people know whether or not he is stating the fact. I am perfectly willing to leave the verdict to them as to who has stated the facts in this controversy. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, I shall insert in the RECORD, as bearing upon the business conditions of the country, an editorial from the Washington Post of July 13, 1914, and a portion of the review of the industrial condition in New England, as printed in the Springfield Union.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Washington Post, July 13, 1914.]

THE FARMER LOSES.

In the 10 months ended April, 1914, the value of foreign foodstuffs imported into the United States increased $10,000,000, or $1,000,000 a month. This money, which should have gone to the American farmer, went to foreign farmers.

In the same period the exports of American foodstuffs decreased $64,416,000, or $6,400,000 a month.

The adverse balance against the American farmer, so far as dealings with the outside world are concerned, is $75,000,000 in 10 months.

During the 10 months ended April, 1914, there were imported 20,058,998 bushels of oats, as against 714,767 bushels imported during the same period ended April, 1913. Comparing the same periods, there were imported 1,854,054 bushels of wheat, against 760,329; other breadstuffs, $2,602,952, against $1,362,630; fruits, $26,155,168, against $21,635,382; nuts, $722,217, against $636,290; butter, $1,633,515, against $253,513; cheese, $9,302,438, against $7,683,399; olive oil, $6,444,247, against $5,815,810; prepared vegetables, $3,015,545, against $2,772,100; fresh vegetables, $1,468,396, against $1,308,821. The importation of eggs during the 10 months ended April, 1914, amounted to 5,043,765 dozens, valued at $1,000,000.

These are staples produced by American farms, orchards, and gardens. The new tariff reduces the duty upon these articles and opens the market to foreign farmers. The foreigner has seized this opportunity and is now making $1,000,000 a month which formerly went to the American farmer.

The consumer gets no benefit from this tariff reduction. The price has not gone down on a single article mentioned. The high tariff formerly kept the foreigner out and gave this business to the American farmer. The new tariff throws the business to the foreign farmer, who, with the middleman, pockets the benefit, and the consumer pays as much as he did before. The only loser is the American farmer.

This loss of $1,000,000 a month covers only 10 months of the new tariff. It is natural that the loss should be greater as soon as foreign farmers awaken to the splendid opportunity offered by the American market. The more they take advantage of this opportunity the more the American farmer will lose.

The only way to prevent this loss to the American farmer is to put the bars up again, and shut out the foreigner. The experiment has been in effect long enough to show that it does not decrease the cost of living.

Maybe this item of $1,000,000 a month loss through the low tariff will be borne in mind by the American farmer when he votes next November for Congressmen who frame tariff bills.

HAND-TO-MOUTH BUYING CAUSES DULL BUSINESS—SURVEY OF WESTERN NEW ENGLAND REVEALS REAL DEPRESSION; FACTORY HEADS NOT OPTIMISTIC; MILLS ON SHORT TIME FILLING LIGHT ORDERS—NO CERTAINTY OF QUICK RECOVERY—CHANGE OF ADMINISTRATION AND SETTLEMENT OF PENDING LEGISLATION NEEDED TO BRIGHTEN OUTLOOK; REPORTS FROM MANY MANUFACTURING CENTERS.

The Union to-day presents its readers a strictly matter of fact, unbiased statement of business conditions in the Connecticut Valley and western Massachusetts as they are found by its regular correspondents. Summarized, the reports show that the business depression in this part of New England is very real. Some communities report prosperity, but they are exceptions to the rule. Four and five day working weeks and 8 hour working days are more common than full weeks and 10-hour days.

Business men say conditions indicate a "hand-to-mouth" buying policy, which means that the factories must run on short time, making just enough goods to keep up with orders. The "hand-to-mouth" policy in turn is due to uncertainty as to the future. Some business men blame the effects of the tariff, and most of them believe there will be no improvement until after the fall elections. While there are optimists among the business firms quoted, there is not a little pessimism.

In Springfield there is unusual dullness, according to the testimony of railroad men, the State free employment bureau and the local president of the National Metal Trades Association, besides the heads of a dozen or more firms. Chicopee has similar reports, and from Pittsfield and vicinity come reports of unpleasant conditions. Holyoke firms are not thriving, although there is not great complaint. North Adams, Brattleboro, Vt., Thompsonville, Conn., and Ware report excellent business conditions, while Greenfield, Northampton, Westfield, and other towns have just ordinary times. Athol and Orange seem to be dull.

The consensus of the reports seems to be that business men are waiting for a change in Congress and a settlement of pending legislative questions before they buy heavily. Orders are light, there are many men out of work, and prospects for the future are not too encouraging.

WHAT SPRINGFIELD MEN SAY ABOUT BUSINESS SITUATION.

The depression in business is reflected in the greatly decreased volume of freight passing through the city over the lines of the New York, New Haven & Hartford, Boston & Albany, and the Boston & Maine Railroads, according to George E. Boss, agent of the New Haven and Boston & Maine roads.

"The attitude of the shippers shows that business is very dull," he said. "For instance, the shipment of full carload lots of freight is far below normal, and, in fact, has fallen almost to nothing. On the other hand, the number of less-than-carload shipments is about normal. That shows that business men are living hand to mouth, as it were, and is about as good a sign of the times as I know."

In the trades the dullness is even more marked than in any other line. Francis F. Squire, president of the Springfield branch of the National Metal Trades Association, says that conditions have not been as bad for years as they are at present.

"There are more skilled mechanics idle to-day than ever before in the history of Springfield," he declared. "Manufacturing plants in the Connecticut Valley, and in the whole eastern part of the country, for that matter, are running with greatly reduced forces of men. For the most part the plants are running full time, but have reduced their forces greatly. This is marked especially in those plants employing large numbers of skilled mechanics.

MANY OUT OF WORK.

Speaking of general conditions in Springfield and vicinity, Chester W. Allen, superintendent of the State Free Employment Bureau, said that there is no question about business being dull.

"We are having practically no call for machinists," he said. "Many of the factories are laying off men, and we have many of the men call every day. Some of them get employment on farms in the vicinity of Springfield, and many seem glad to get anything while things are dull. The building trades, also, are dull, and many are out of work at present. While once in a while there is a call for men, there always are many times more idle men than there are jobs for them. In Springfield, building seems to be almost at a standstill. There is a good demand for farm labor and for general laborers. The farmers are taking many of them, but even then there are nowhere near enough jobs to go around."

Following are the statements of some representative Springfield business men on present-day conditions:

Harold A. Wesson, assistant treasurer of Smith & Wesson:

"Our business is very quiet at the present time, much more so than usual at this time of the year. Evidently people are not spending money for firearms, if they have any money to spend."

Herman Schelhammer, assistant factory manager of the Bosch Magneto Co.:

"At the present time our business is good, because we are in the midst of the summer auto season. In general, business is the same as last year, but not as good as it was two and three years ago."

DULLNESS AT HENDEE FACTORY.

R. W. Ellingham, works manager of the Hendee Manufacturing Co.:

"We are in the midst of the slack season, but our business for the past six months has not been as good as the corresponding six months of last year."

Walter H. Whiteside, president of the Stevens-Duryea Automobile Co.:

"Our business from January 1, 1914, to July 1, 1914, was 28 per cent greater than in the corresponding period last year. We have made more cars, and our general business is much better. The increase in demand for cars, however, comes largely from the West and Middle West."

C. B. Potter, president and treasurer of the Potter Knitting Co.:

"Immediate business is good, but the outlook for the future is not bright. The last year has been an uncomfortable and uncertain one in our line. Customers who should be buying now for next fall are putting it off, and business seems to be going along on a 'hand-to-mouth' method."

W. R. Reid, treasurer of the National Needle Co.:

"Our business is holding up well, although it is not quite as good as it was last year. The outlook for the future does not look promising."

Harold Ley, president of the Fred T. Ley & Co. (Inc.):

"Our business is better than ever. The outlook is splendid, and everything looks rosy, as far as we are concerned."

Kurt R. Sternberg, treasurer and general manager of the Dickinson Manufacturing Co.:

"Although we have more customers than in previous years, they are not buying as much as usual. Our business has been 40 per cent less than last year and 25 per cent less than two years ago. We have found it necessary to lay off 22 per cent of our help. However, the business outlook is good at the present time."

An officer of the National Equipment Co. said:

"Our business is not as good by a great deal as it was last year. Our plant is running on short time, and the immediate future holds no promise for better conditions."

MR. GILBERT PESSIMISTIC.

Adolph W. Gilbert, president and general manager of the Chapman Valve Manufacturing Co.: "Our sales and orders for the last year are about the same as the preceding year, but this comes by our going out for special work and quoting lower prices. The sales and orders of our regular business, as reported by our branch houses, show a decrease of 25 per cent from the preceding year. The outlook for the future is bad, and I fear the coming six months more than I did the six which have just passed. I do not believe that the outlook in our business will become any brighter until some time after the fall elections."

Joshua L. Brooks, president and treasurer of the Brooks Bank Note Co. and president of the Springfield Board of Trade: "Our business for the last six months shows a 5 per cent increase over the corresponding months of last year. The majority of business has come in small orders, and indicates a 'hand-to-mouth' policy of buying. The future looks good, and I believe that we have passed over the worst part of the bad business conditions."

Charles J. Spill, superintendent of the United Button Co.: "We have done but 40 per cent of the business this year that we did last year, and the business outlook from our standpoint is bad. The majority of our orders have been small, and our business has practically diversified into a retail proposition."

Charles S. Potter, manager of the Hampden Lumber Co.: "Our business this year is quite a little off from that of last year, but general conditions seem to be improving and the outlook is favorable."

Walter P. Dodge, treasurer and general manager of Barney & Berry (Inc.): "Our business depends to a great extent upon the weather, and it is almost impossible to make a careful and accurate forecast of business conditions."

Theodore W. Leete, treasurer and general manager of the Taber-Prang Art Co.: "There is a general uncertainty and depression in the business world, and our concern has felt it. People hesitate in placing any large orders, and everyone seems to be waiting for the business atmosphere to clear so that they may know where they are at. The outlook for the immediate future is not good."

WEST SPRINGFIELD PAPER MILLS RUN ON SHORT SCHEDULE.

West Springfield manufacturers and business men are not rushed with work. Inquiry among them reveals that times are very quiet.

"Our business is quiet, and on account of slack orders we have been obliged to cut down to from four to five days a week," was the statement of William H. Shuart, president of the Springfield Glazed Paper Co. Mr. Shuart said that he foresees no immediate relief from the present condition of affairs.

"On account of a falling off in business it has been necessary for us to reduce the help 25 per cent since March 1," said F. O. Scott, superintendent of the Southworth Paper Co., Mittineague.

P. J. Shea, chief clerk of the Boston & Albany shops, said that the business at the shops is as good as last year and it has not been necessary to reduce the help.

C. P. Fairbanks, factory manager of the Gilbert & Barker Manufacturing Co., said that business is good and the factory has been running more hours than usual. As to the outlook for the future, Mr. Fairbanks has nothing to say.

E. L. Clark, general manager of the Ramapogue Ice Co., said that business was good and he had optimistic views of the future.

L. H. Moses, of the Strathmore Paper Co., said that the company is satisfied with the present condition, but looks for an improvement in the future. The company is running full time and the help has not been reduced.

Charles B. Clark, jr., manager of the Clark Independent Oil Co., said that business is good and prospects for the future are bright.

Thomas L. Hisgen, president of the Four Bros. Independent Oil Co., said that business has fallen off considerably in comparison with last year and collections are slow. Mr. Hisgen sees no immediate relief from the present state of affairs, and says that the policies of the Wilson administration have had a demoralizing effect on general business. He said that there is uncertainty in the business world and a large part of the falling off is due to tariff revision.

DULLNESS IN CHICOPEE MILLS—PROSPECTS FOR FUTURE ARE UNCERTAIN.

Reports from the different factories in Chicopee show a general depression, which has been felt since the last part of May and the early part of June. In many cases a large number of hands have been laid off, while in others the condition has been met by a reduction in the working hours. The months of June and July are the dull season of the year, which, added to the scarcity of orders, has resulted in the reduction of working forces.

Many rumors have been current to the effect that some of the Chicopee factories are on the verge of a shutdown, but the reports of the officials are encouraging.

Having filled their last summer order, the Stevens-Duryea Automobile Co. is operating with only a little more than half of its usual force. The average number of hands employed is 1,400. The slack period is expected to continue about six weeks, when the new orders will come in and the old hands who have not secured work elsewhere will be reinstated. Some of the departments have closed down, but these will be the first to start when the dull season is over. This year is said to be a fair average from a business point of view, and no serious slump in business is anticipated by the officials of the company.

About 550 hands are employed in the J. Stevens Arms & Tool Co., or about two-thirds of the average for the last 10 years. In the opinion of the officials of the company the general depression has had little or no effect on their business.

With its entire force on three-quarters time, there is prospect of a further reduction in help and time at the Lamb Knitting Machine Co. It is a general slump in business, lack of orders, and an unfavorable outlook to the officials. The factory is now employed in special work.

The Chicopee Manufacturing Co. has felt the usual annual depression and is operating with about 65 per cent of the usual force of 1,300 men. The officials feel nothing but the seasonable dull spell and expect a quick recovery.

Quite favorable conditions are reported by the National Scale Co., which is working with a trifle less than the full force. The business during June was far ahead of the same month in 1913, and May was about the same as last year, with the general conditions considered promising. No further lay off is expected.

A depression in business has been felt by the Belcher & Taylor Agricultural Tool Co. since June 1, but allowances are made by them, as this is always the dull season. A quick recovery is expected. There has been a reduction in hours but no lay off.

The regular force is employed at the A. G. Spalding & Bros. Co. plant, with a slight reduction in hours. A depression has been felt by the firm since June 1, which is an unusual experience, according to an official. In some of the departments the hands have been reduced to an eight-hour day. It is much more slack than last year at this time.

HOLYOKE KEENLY FEELS DEPRESSION—MANY MILLS ARE SHUT DOWN.

HOLYOKE, July 6.

That the so-called psychological depression in business has been felt in every line of industry in Holyoke is evidenced by inquiries made by the Union among manufacturers during the last week. As for the causes of this slackness, the general opinion appears to be that it is simply a reflection of the conditions reported to exist throughout the country. By practically all it is looked upon as only temporary, and an optimistic view is taken of the future, but it is added that it is a difficult matter to prophesy whether or not business will pick up next fall. As one manufacturer sized it up, "Business is dull because we have no orders. Without orders we can't run our plants. It may be that orders will come along for the fall, but that is something that we can tell nothing about. We've simply got to sit back and hope for the best."

Only one mill official volunteered the opinion that the present industrial depression was due to the tariff. He declared that the textile business was worse at the present time than it had been in the last 15 years. He expressed himself strongly regarding the tariff, which allows the importation of goods from foreign countries which can be purchased cheaper than the home product. This official takes a rather gloomy view of the future, and sees no relief for his business until the tariff is changed.

MANY PLANTS CLOSED.

The principal industries of the city, the paper and textile mills, are passing through a period of dullness much greater than in former years. Most of them always experience a certain amount of slackness at this time of the year, but the "hard times" have hit them so that they are running on short time, and the employees can take about as much time for their annual vacations as they wish.

Last week the Linden, Holyoke, Gill, Mount Tom, and Beebe Holbrook divisions of the American Writing Paper Co. were closed down because of the lack of orders. The plant of the Crocker-McElwain Paper Co. was also closed. In the textile branch the Lyman Mills Co. and the William Skinner & Sons, silk manufacturers, shut down their mills last week, and the American Thread Co.'s three divisions, Merrick No. 1, Merrick No. 2, and Hadley, shut down last Friday, and the employees are on vacations of from 4 to 10 days. The annual shutdown, when the water is drawn from the canals in order that the Holyoke Water Power Co. may make repairs on the canals, and repairs may also be made in the mills, comes July 29 and continues until August 3.

Officials of the Farr Alpaca Co., manufacturers of alpaca, serges, and worsted goods, stated when interviewed that the year started off very well, but recently there has been a slight slackness noted. It is hard to diagnose the cause of this dullness, but it appears to be a reflection of the "spotty" condition of business everywhere. The outlook for the fall is none too bright, but the best is hoped for.

Joseph A. Skinner, of William Skinner & Sons, said that the silk industry is very poor just now. It is pretty hard to tell the cause, but it is probable that this business feels the effects of the general depression.

COTTON FACTORIES DULL.

James A. Burke, agent for the Lyman Mills, manufacturers of cotton goods, said that slackness has been noted in that business, but is hopeful that it is only temporary; but declined to hazard any prediction regarding the future. Up to the present officials of the American Thread Co. stated that the three local divisions had been going along under full time. This year, instead of cutting down the working schedule during the dull season an experiment is being tried. The finishing department shut down last Friday and will remain closed until July 8, while the manufacturing end also closed July 3 and will not resume until July 13. It is always dull, it was stated, in the thread business at this time of the year, but it is duller now than in many years.

Even if business is slowing up, several mills are going right ahead building new additions, which would indicate that the manufacturers are figuring that conditions will improve. The Lyman Mills Co. is erecting a new stock house and cloth department, and the Germania Mills, manufacturers of woolen and worsted goods, has filed plans for a new building in South Street. These mills, it is expected, will cost in the neighborhood of $100,000 each.

Another cheering fact is that the Beebe-Webber Co., manufacturers of worsted cloths, which announced some months ago that it intended to go out of business, will continue. Negotiations for the sale of the plant were carried on with the Eureka Ruling & Binding Co., and just when it looked as though the deal would be consummated, the announcement was made that the Beebe-Webber Co. officials had decided to continue business. The Holyoke Board of Trade also had a committee endeavoring to interest capital in taking over the mill, so that the business would be saved to the city. Beebe-Webber Co. has been in existence for many years and gives employment to several hundred hands.

The "psychological depression" has not appeared to have hit some of the smaller concerns as hard as the bigger mills. The Eureka Co., now that it failed to secure the Beebe-Webber plant, is said to be planning to build an addition that will double its floor space.

PITTSFIELD BUSINESS MEN PESSIMISTIC—SEE NO IMPROVEMENT AHEAD.

PITTSFIELD, July 6.

Most of the manufacturers in Pittsfield and vicinity are perfectly frank to state that times are exceedingly dull, and although many of them are at the present time running with their full force of employees, there are few who expect they will be able to do so for long. With few exceptions they look to Washington as the seat of the trouble.

Acting Manager Joseph Insull, of the Pittsfield branch of the General Electric Co., was unwilling to give any figures or facts, and on being questioned as to the number of men employed at the plant and the conditions there said: "There has been no material change since the first of the year. C. C. Chesney's statement then covers the present situation."

Mr. Chesney's statement was optimistic, but he gave no figures. He is now in Europe, and subofficials at the General Electric plant, as well as employees, look for no change in the working hours and conditions until his return. From employees it is learned that the normal working force has been reduced about 1,000, or one-sixth of the full force. Many of the 5,000 or less who remain are working on small time.

"Conditions are such to-day," Mr. Insull said, "that I do not think it is advisable to seek publicity. Let them straighten things out at Washington. I see President Wilson was in conference with J. P. Morgan the other day. Interviewed President Wilson about industrial conditions. But on the whole I think we would rather see good news in the papers." For facts the reporter was referred to the officers of the General Electric Co., at Schenectady, N. Y.

LIVING FROM HAND TO MOUTH.

H. R. Russell, president of the S. N. & C. Russell Manufacturing Co., which employs about 250 persons in its textile mills here, said that the mills are running full time with full force, but that business is not on a satisfactory basis. "We are living in our business," he said, "from hand to mouth. I have guessed everything as the reason for the business depression and have guessed wrong each time. I believe political conditions have some bearing on them."

Franklin Weston, president of the Byron Weston Manufacturing Co., in Dalton, said: "We are employing a full force of men and women, about 250, but business is very slack. We expect to shut down for two or three weeks very soon on account of the dullness. Incidentally we shall make some repairs, but we are not shutting down for repairs. Bad business is the reason. Furthermore, we expect to have to shut down again later for another period.

"The only remedy for this depression, I believe," said Mr. Weston, "will be a change in the administration, either in its head or in the Legislature. I look to see a total change in the complexion of the Legislature next fall, the change being in favor of the Republican Party. I believe most manufacturers are waiting for the result of the fall elections before they do anything."

W. M. Crane, jr., of Crane & Co., of Dalton, had the most optimistic report of any of the manufacturers in this district. He said that the mills were all running on full time, and that the outlook was fair. The business depression, although generally felt, has not rested heavily on the Crane & Co. trade. The Government mill will start July 6, after being shut down for three weeks for the annual repairs.

Willard Smith, of the Smith Paper Co., of Lee, has a vastly different story to tell. He reports that, although the Smith mill has been run on full time and employing all their help to date, from now on it will be necessary to cut the working time down to four days a week. The pay roll of the company carries more than 400 hands. Mr. Smith said that the good showing up to date has been made possible by the fact that there were many orders ahead, and that as long as these lasted the working conditions remained steady.

FOREIGN PAPER HURTS TRADE.

He said that more than $20,000,000 worth of paper had come into the United States since the opening of the present administration, and that under the present tariff no adjustment of the paper trade could be expected save lowering of wages. Foreign paper made by cheap labor is flooding the market, and American-made goods can not compete under the present arrangement. Japan and England are the chief competitors, said Mr. Smith. The prices on paper such as that manufactured by the Smith Co. have been lowered from 3 to 5 cents on the pound. A change in the administration or reduced wages must come, was Mr. Smith's final word.

At the Pontoosuc Woolen Co. it was reported that up to the present the mills had run along on full time, employing the usual number of men. The business outlook is very dubious, according to Supt. Clifford Francis. The schedule has been continued to date on a hand-to-mouth basis. Unsettled general conditions and the disinclination of consumers to take chances until they see how the tide is going is his view of the cause of the dullness.

A. W. Eaton, president and treasurer of the Eaton, Crane & Pike Co., which employs normally 950 to 1,000 men and women, is now running with about 875 on the pay roll and 8 hours instead of 10 hours a day.

Mr. Eaton ascribes this to general depression, uncertainty of legislation, and uncertainty as to the crops this year. He said that certainty as to the legislation will be the only permanent stabilizer of business prosperity, in his opinion, although a bumper crop will give a temporary stimulus.

James R. Savery, treasurer of the Berkshire Woolen & Worsted Co., reports that this company has not laid off any hands and the mills are running full time, but at a very scanty profit. If it were not for the fact that it is better to keep the organization together and the wheels turning, the mill would be shut down.

"The tariff is absolutely to blame for the depression in our business," said Mr. Savery. "It should be 50 per cent instead of 35 per cent on wool. The Democratic administration is partly to blame for the dullness but not entirely. The Democrats need some competition."

NORTHAMPTON SILK INDUSTRY THRIVING—EASTHAMPTON DULL.

NORTHAMPTON, July 6.

It is not the easiest thing in the world to size up the industrial situation in Northampton. A manufacturer hesitates a long time before he commits himself, and then he does it in a confidential sort of way. He says, perhaps, "I do not mind telling you personally that business is mighty poor and that my best judgment tells me that it will be worse before it is better. I would not mind telling you personally what departments are the dullest and exactly how many men are laid off, but if my competitors should get hold of this they would make a handle of it. They would insist that we are doing no business, and you know that a business man likes to do business with a concern that is rushing things." It must be admitted that this is sound philosophy, and the man who would like to put up a real calamity howl, after thinking the thing over and looking at it from personal reasons, represents that business is rather better than it actually is.

It is not easy to mark things as a teacher would a class and state positively that this business is good, that fair, and the other poor. In the canvass that has been made a few concerns report business as good. They do not see any falling off from 12 months ago, and since they are doing as much under present conditions regard it as good business.

Many others say that business is only fair, while some admit that it is poor and that there is a mighty hard outlook ahead. It must be admitted that there is no rush in the manufacturing plants. There is little or no overtime work, and the one thing that tells volumes is the fact that the factories are shutting down two weeks this summer in place of a week for the annual inventory, which is taken Fourth of July week. Another indication is the general reports of employees. They almost invariably say that things are dull. Again, there are quite a good many idle men. There has not been a time in many years when so many were applying for jobs and ready to do almost any kind of work. These are straws that tell which way the wind blows.

It must also be stated that some concerns are doing a good business in spite of conditions. They are running full time and with a full force. This does not mean that things are going with a rush, but there is activity in business, and for the time of year it is quite remarkable.

SILK FACTORIES BUSY.

Northampton is a center for silk manufactures. When times are hard it would seem as if the silk industry would be the first to suffer. Silk is a sort of luxury, and one would think it would be one of the first things to be discarded. This does not seem to be the case. The silk industries are running full time and with almost a full force. They have not been hard hit by the depression, which may be a mere matter of mind. Silk is purchased by the wealthier class, and this undoubtedly accounts for the activity. The tariff has not affected silk greatly.

Alexander McCallum, president of McCallum's Hosiery, says that business this summer has been normal. In spots there has been some depression, with activity in other departments, so that things average up well. The shop is running full time and with a full force. He says the tariff has not affected the concern and feels that prospects are good for silk hosiery.

Samuel W. Lee, treasurer of the Nonotuck Silk Co., at Florence and Leeds, which manufactures silk thread and silk braid, says business has been fairly good. The shops have been running full time and with an average force for the summer season. As yet he sees no effect from the tariff, but cannot forsee final results. He does not feel that it is safe to predict for the future and is decidedly anxious that Congress adjourn.

E. F. Crooks, manager of Belding Bros., manufacturers of silk thread and silk linings, says there has been a slight decline in business for several months. The shop is running full time, but not with a full force, about 15 per cent of the employees not being at work. He feels that times are going to be worse before they are better.

CUTLERY IS QUIET.

The three cutleries at Bay State—the Northampton, Rogers, and the Clement Manufacturing Co.—report the same thing. In none of them is there any rush. Things are going along slowly, there being no attempt to speed up and no demand for the greatest efficiency. Business is quiet, more so than usual at this time of year, and Rogers and the Northampton Cutlery are shut down for two weeks. The summer is always a quiet time and in the early fall business begins to pick up for the holiday trade. The outlook is not promising.

The Florence Manufacturing Co. reports normal business for the time of year. In January the company found itself with an immense stock of hair and tooth brushes on hand, and for weeks the shop ran eight hours a day with a half holiday Saturday. The stock was worked off, and now orders are coming in with their usual activity. The plant is running full time, and is dull in certain departments only. William Cordes, general manager, says the reduction of employees at the present time is not more than 5 per cent. He feels that the outlook in his line of goods is encouraging.

The Williams Manufacturing Co., which makes baskets, reports good business in certain lines and poor business in mill baskets and that trade. On the whole conditions are satisfactory for the time of the year, taking into account the general trend of business. The Florence Co., which manufactures cabinets and gas stoves, reports business good. They have not been affected by the hard times and find things normal. The company is running full time and with the ordinary force. The Norwood Engineering Co., of Florence, manufacturers of filters, hydrants, and machinery, reports a normal business. Things have been dull, but are picking up, and the outlook is encouraging.

DULLNESS IN EASTHAMPTON.

In Easthampton conditions are not as favorable as in Northampton. The principal manufactures are cotton goods and elastic webs, and in both of these there is a marked depression. The West Boylston Co., manufacturers of cotton goods, says: "We have been hit, with all textile manufacturers. There is no denying the fact that business is poor. We are in the same boat with New Bedford and other cotton manufacturing centers. Business is carried on from hand to mouth, there being neither large orders nor large purchases. We do not see a bright outlook ahead, and fear that things will be worse before they are better. We are running full time, but with only about 75 per cent of a full force."

The Hampton Co., mercerizers, bleachers, and dyers, tells practically the same story. The company admits that business is not good and that prospects are not bright. Large orders are not coming in and the company is not buying in large quantities. There is no rush about placing orders and drummers are not insisting that orders must be placed at once or they can not be filled. The company is running a full day force but practically no night force, this representing about a fourth of the usual day force. In certain lines there is activity, and if one were so disposed could use these as a barometer and declare that business was rushing. Activity is only in spots, and generally speaking there is more than a psychological depression.

In rubber elastics there has been a marked depression for many months. This is not due to the present administration but to styles in dress. Young men are wearing belts and not suspenders, and this means hard times for the manufacturers of elastic webs. Business is a little better than it has been, but is far from good. For nearly two years the mills have not been running full capacity, many of the looms being idle.

HUNTINGTON HUSTLING.

Business in Huntington is good. Mills are all running full time. The Huntington Manufacturing Co. woolen mill has been running nights. Some new buildings are being built, and it has been difficult to secure sufficient help. The town has been reconstructing the Pond Brook Road, so called, and it was necessary to get outside help, as the labor supply in the home market was inadequate, and in consequence about 25 out-of-town men had to be hired. Lumbermen and farmers find it extremely difficult to hire men for their business in the local market, and are obliged to get men elsewhere.

Huntington has no cause to complain, except that the labor supply is short. There is no reason to expect any different conditions in this section.

GREENFIELD TOOL TRADE DULL—DEPRESSION IS FELT BY FACTORIES.

GREENFIELD, July 6.

It is not uncommon to have business quiet with Greenfield industries at this season of the year, and most of the factories are now shut down for the summer vacation. It is the annual inventory time, and July is the vacation month for employees.

The Goodell-Pratt Co., manufacturers of mechanics' tools, employing 275 hands, has been running 10 hours a day up to the vacation time, and after the first two weeks in this month will resume operations, with only a few men out in the foundry. W. M. Pratt, at the head of the company, is abroad studying the foreign business situation. It is reported at the factory that just now there is a dullness in the tool trade, considered to be only temporary depression.

F. E. Wells & Son, manufacturers of tools and machinery, employing 100 men, have reduced the number nearly one-half since a year ago, with 45 hours to the week in all departments but one. This is on a basis of 20 per cent less time. The factory closed Thursday for 10 days, a longer period than usual, due to the general business depression, which perhaps has been brought about to some extent through delay in settling up the railroad matters and the new tariff. However, it is thought that good crops may enliven business conditions this fall. No magnitude of business is expected for a long time. Salesmen report generally poor business, with conditions worse than in 1893 and 1894.

BUSINESS IS QUIET.

The Goodell Manufacturing Co., makers of mechanics' tools, feels keenly the present business depression and looks forward to no special change for a year. Business is reported to have dropped 20 per cent off from last year, and a similar reduction in the employment of labor has been the natural consequence.

The Russell Manufacturing Co., screw-cutting tools, employing 25 men, opened its new factory in November. Naturally business has been brisk in work to prepare for the trade. Employees are working 10 hours a day, and the shutdown was only for the Fourth of July vacation.

The Greenfield Machine Co., employing 15 men, was shut down July 3 for one week. They attribute the very little domestic business to general hard times and have been working on export business. The company officers believe reduction in the tariff has had something to do with the present conditions.

The Bicknell-Thomas Co., manufacturers of specialties and friction clutches, report that business depression is at a low ebb. The company looks forward to an increase, with a hope that honest business will soon get a chance to go forward.

Emil Weissbrod & Sons, manufacturers of pocketbooks, employ 125 hands, against 175 last year. The concern feels there is a general business depression, but no definite reason is given.

COMPARISON OF CONDITIONS.

The American Tap & Die Co.'s factory is shut down for one week and has a full stock on hand. Hard times are felt, because orders are coming in slow as compared to last year.

The Greenfield Tap & Die Corporation, through Treasurer F. H. Payne, says the following of business:

"I inclose copy of some figures that we mailed the Wall Street Journal, at their request, on June 15, making comparison of business for the first five months of 1912, 1913, and 1914. In making up this list we have considered 1913 as representing a maximum, or 100 per cent. Percentages for the years 1912 and 1914, on either side of the column containing 1913 results, represent proportional amounts of the various items of the other two years.

"I may further state that we do not believe business in this country will increase until Congress adjourns and until the railroads have been allowed an increase in their freight rates."

Mr. Payne's comparison is as follows, percentage based on assumption of 1913 figures being 100 per cent:

	Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.
Wages, Jan. 1 to June 1	84.24	100	74.45
Average number of employees	84.68	100	87.22
Number of days employed	100	100	86.66
Average number of hours per week per man	100	100	84.44
Sales	86.34	100	80.58
Orders received	----------	100	88.63
Orders unfilled June 1	----------	100	54.89

MANY MEN OUT OF WORK, BUT NO HARD TIMES IN WESTFIELD.

WESTFIELD, July 6.

Judging from the number of men in town who are out of work, there seems to be general industrial depression; but a canvass of the factories fails to reveal such a condition. While some of the plants are not running full time, owing to the summer schedules of hours, none of them is greatly inconvenienced.

The Pope Co.'s plant is not very busy, many hands having been laid off, and the company's affairs are such that in some of the departments a four-day schedule has become effective.

Just when the entire plant will be running on full time is a question, but it is hoped that with the harvest season there will be better times at the plant. During the winter months more than 900 men were employed at times in the plant, but this number has gradually dropped down until one of the recent pay rolls showed 690 men at work. Since that time some of the men have been laid off, but the company claims that there is not the serious depression which has been rumored. Receipts for June did not reach the figure of a year ago, but this is explained by the fact that it takes a moneyed market to dispose of the goods. With bumper crops in the fall it is hoped that there will be more money, and consequently the demand for motor cycles and bicycles will increase.

In the H. B. Smith foundries there is not a noticeable curtailment of work. The men are not working on full time, owing to the agreement which was reached with the officials during the summer months. There are more than 900 men employed at the present time, and this number is less than 100 short of that which is employed in the rush seasons. These are the two large plants of the town, although the whip industry employs the largest number of men in Westfield. In another large plant there was a third more business done during the month of June than a year ago.

There are plenty of laborers unemployed at the present time and this is attributed to the fact that there is little building, and unskilled men are out of work. Westfield seems to be faring better than some of the other industrial communities, but the depression is being felt here. Some of the manufacturers are most firm in their statements that it is not a "psychological" depression.

MANY MEN OUT OF WORK IN ATHOL—SHOE TRADE GOOD.

ATHOL, July 6.

The business depression is strongly felt in this town, especially in the metal trade. Peculiar, however, while the metal works are having hard sledding, the shoe manufacturing business is good, and a fairly large number of orders continue to come in. The largest industry in Athol is the L. S. Starrett Co., manufacturers of fine mechanical tools. This company which employes nearly 800 skilled mechanics, has reduced its working hours twice during the last three months. The last reduction was made last week, the factory now being run on a four-days-a-week basis.

Frank E. Wing, secretary of the Starrett Co., has come into considerable prominence of late on account of a letter written by him on business conditions and sent to President Wilson. The Union recently printed the letter in full. The statement of President Wilson that the depression is merely psychological has gained national prominence, but the Athol concern, through Mr. Wing, probably was the first definitely to take up the statement for analysis, directly with the manufacturers through the Employers' Association. Copies of the letter have been circulated by Donald Tulloch, secretary of the association, of Worcester. The impression which the letter has created among Worcester County Association members who received it can be imagined when one firm ordered 1,000 copies sent it for distribution. Mr. Wing has also written to several of the Congressmen an entirely different letter along the same lines. Mr. Wing says: "We have endeavored in every way possible to uphold the hands of the President, and to refrain from doing and saying anything which might be construed in the slightest degree criticizing his actions and his policies. For the last year we have consistently lied about business, said it was good and that everything looked all right for a continuance, and even an increase in good business, and that we must give the President and Congress a fair show, and everything would come out all right. But business is not good. It has not been good for a year, and it is steadily growing worse."

PHILIPPINES TRADE LOST.

Mr. Wing places a large part of the blame for the business conditions of this country on the tariff, but finds an altogether different reason for the depression in our most notable insular possessions. Metal trade with the Philippines has fallen off with great rapidity. Of the situation there Mr. Wing says: "The present administration has killed business in the Philippines. When it came into power there was a flourishing business there, and we ourselves were having a good business in our tools in Manila, but the present policy of turning out Americans and putting Filipinos in their places in responsible positions has absolutely strangled business throughout the country. A prominent business man from Manila, who was in our office within a month, stated to us that more harm had been done to business conditions in the preceding eight months than could possibly be remedied in three years, if conditions could at once be brought back to their former status."

The Union Twist Drill Co., a metal concern, and one of the three largest in town, employing 600 skilled mechanics, is also affected by the hard times. This company has cut 10 hours a week from its working schedule. It manufactures gears and cutters, selling mostly to the manufacturer. Although this concern is affected by the depression, it is evident that its officials look at it as only temporary, for it awarded this week a contract to the E. J. Cross Co., of Worcester, for a three-story factory building of brick construction and a brick addition one story high at an estimated cost of $60,000.

SHOE BUSINESS IS GOOD.

The Bates Bros., manufacturers of pocketbooks, one of the oldest industries in Athol, is another affected by the depression in business. The firm reduced its running time nearly two months ago. It employs about 150 hands, mostly women. It is the first time this company has reduced its working schedule for 16 years.

Business is remarkably good with the Lee Bros. Shoe Co. This concern is working full time and hiring new hands continuously. It employs 600 workmen. Business in this factory is fully as good as it was a year ago at this time.

Business in the various other factories in Athol, all employing less than 100 hands, is fairly good, considering them as a whole. None of these have laid off men or made a cut in business hours.

Store business is poor. The reduction in hours by the two big metal companies makes a big difference in the amount of money spent with the local merchants. Again, with the employees not knowing whether their jobs are safe and the possibility of another reduction in working hours coming, it makes them think twice before spending for more than the bare necessities of life. Although the merchants are advertising early sales and pushing goods at ridiculously low prices in an effort to get them off their hands, the goods are moving slow. Some manufacturers and merchants look for better times by the 1st of October, but others are pessimistic.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. GILLETT. But that side has had an hour and five minutes and we have only had 15 minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. I supposed we were alternating in speakers.

Mr. GILLETT. I do not think it is equitable to use 1 hour and 5 minutes on that side and on this side 15 minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. FLOOD of Virginia). The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, the gentleman from Washington read from the Washington Post of this morning the following language:

WILMINGTON, DEL., July 13.

The industrial depression has struck Wilmington with vigor. It was announced to-day by officials of the Harlan & Hollingsworth Corporation that 1,000 workmen have been discharged during the past few weeks.

He stopped there. The article continues:

The officials, when asked, declined to blame the Democratic administration for the condition.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I stated that I was going to put the rest of the article in.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HEFLIN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is too late; the Chair had announced that there was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I should be glad to have the privilege of yielding 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. GILLETT. I wish to yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming, and it is for the Chair to decide who is entitled to the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts has just occupied time, and the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP].

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, if the description of calamity given by the gentleman from Washington is as far wrong in other places as his statements of it in my district, he is woefully mistaken. On the 2d of July the gentleman from Washington stood on the floor of this House and announced that the Showers Manufacturing Co., of Blomington, Ind., the largest factory in my district, had closed for want of business. He reiterates that statement again to-day. Nothing could have been farther from the fact. When he made that statement July 2, I telegraphed to Bloomington about the matter and received the following reply:

BLOOMINGTON, IND., July 2, 1914.

Hon. W. A. CULLOP, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.:

Showers factory has enjoyed the most prosperous year in its 40 years' business. It always closes the week of July 4 for vacations. It will resume work next Monday with a full force of 1,000 men, with orders enough to run till Christmas. Stone operators forced to work their men 12 hours a day to get out orders. Every factory in Bloomington is running full force, and the Wilson administration is being commended by all except the Republican calamity howlers.

OSCAR CRAVENS.

Now, if that is the kind of calamity that the gentleman from Washington means in my district, I wish he would give us more of it. Not only the Showers factory, which is said to be the largest factory of its kind in the world, is prosperous, but Bloomington is a city in the heart of the oolitic limestone district in Indiana, and the mills are not able to fill their orders in that territory, and to-day they are building three new stone mills, at an aggregate cost of $180,000, to meet the increased demand for their product.

In addition to that, in the city of Bloomington they are building private dwellings and business houses costing over $300,000, every factory is running to its fullest capacity, and business was never better in that city than it is to-day. On Monday following the Fourth of July vacation the Showers factory started up, employing a thousand men, 200 more than the gentleman from Washington said were turned out of employment, and on that day it received 400 additional new orders. Rather prosperous, it seems to me.

Now, I want to say to the gentleman from Washington that I tried to give him some good advice some time ago about the Republicans of Indiana, concerning the information he gets from them. The Republican State chairman of Indiana was here three days before the gentleman from Washington made his speech. He lives in my congressional district. I live in the same congressional district in which the Showers factory is located. He knew, or could have known, when he left Indiana on the Sunday before his arrival here that the story was not true, but he brought it over for the purpose of stringing the gentleman from Washington. I told him to beware of Indiana Republicans. [Laughter.] But it seems he did not heed the advice and fell into the trap they set for him. Now, again I want to impress on him, so he will not be strung again, to beware of what they tell him, but always investigate it thoroughly before he rushes on the floor of the House and inserts it in a calamity speech. No doubt every Republican in Indiana laughed when they heard of it about how easy the gentleman from Washington was.

They are a smooth bunch I say to him, and they saw the desperation of the gentleman and the spectacle he was making of himself, and they wanted to make him as ridiculous as possible, as they knew every time he spoke he was hurting their party, and they brought that story over here and had the gentleman circulate it through the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, in order that everybody would realize how utterly ridiculous the statement was and at a time when the factory was enjoying as great prosperity as it had ever enjoyed in its history.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am unable to comprehend the motive of the gentleman from Washington in making such statements without any foundation or reliable information concerning the same. Does he not realize such statements are calculated to do good people and their business serious injury and might do them great financial harm? Does he, in his desperation to bolster up standpatism and in trying to keep alive its rapidly dying embers, believe it necessary to attack sound business institutions and circulate in the most public manner false rumors about their true conditions? If he does, let me say to him he will fail in his indefensible attempt. The people have been fooled as long as they are going to be about protection and standpatism. They know it is a subterfuge and a sham.

The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] is circulating these reports against good business men, assassinating the character of business in this country. William N. Showers, the head of the Showers industry at Bloomington, Ind., is one of the four brothers who founded that industry 40 years ago. From small beginning they built it up until it is the greatest of its kind in the world. They pride themselves upon their business character, upon their business management, upon their good financial standing before the world, and yet the gentleman from Washington is the first man in all this country who has attempted to assassinate their good business standing. Before he circulates rumors of this kind injuring the financial and business standing of men throughout the country the gentleman ought to investigate the truth of the statements.

Mr. Showers is a high-minded, sagacious business man, with an untarnished reputation. For years this industry has established and maintained the custom of giving the employees a week's vacation during Fourth of July week and the Christmas holidays, and it matters not how pressing business is, this custom is always observed. It has proven most satisfactory, and the relations between the employers and their employees are most harmonious. In this industry disputes between the laborers and their employers are unknown; it avoids strikes, lawsuits, and animosities, and produces the very highest efficiency. It is due this splendid management that I should say this here and give it as wide publicity as possible.

The people of Bloomington are proud of this great and thriving industry, and honor Mr. Showers as one of the most successful and enterprising citizens of the great State of Indiana, and I am glad of the opportunity in this public way to pay him this deserved tribute.

Now, Mr. Chairman, both the gentleman from Washington and the Republican State chairman have circulated a base slander, without any reasonable excuse, about this reputable institution, calculated to do it injury in the business world and humiliate its management. Their object I am unable to comprehend, but it will react on them and the party they represent. They have attempted to assassinate the good reputation which these people have enjoyed for 40 years, but their attempts will prove futile and their efforts will be denounced by all high-minded, self-respecting people, irrespective of party affiliations. Such methods to bolster up a failing political cause are to be deprecated, and the men who resort to them will sooner or later be cast into oblivion, where they belong.

On Tuesday, July 8, I received the following telegram from the proprietor of the Bloomington Daily World:

The Fourth of July vacation given by the Showers factory is over, and on yesterday it resumed operation with a thousand men, running its fullest capacity; and the first day it received over 400 new orders. Business is booming here.

This is the situation of this prosperous plant, and all of the slanders circulated by the gentleman from Washington and the Republican State chairman can not change it. They may assault reputable institutions, circulate slanders, in their desperation to discredit prosperity and the success of Democratic policies, but their assaults will be in vain, and their inexcusable conduct meet the rebuke it deserves at the hands of an indignant and outraged public.

The Indianapolis papers repudiated the statement of the gentleman from Washington as soon as it was made on the floor of this House. I want to read now from the Indianapolis Star about the condition there. The Indianapolis Star is a Republican paper, with Bull Moose tendencies. [Laughter.] The Indianapolis Star says that some of the Republican calamity howlers of that city have acknowledged privately that their sales this year are far ahead of last year—that they are simply doing the calamity talk in the hope that it will fool the ignorant people and get the old standpat party back into power.

Such is their public confession. Oh, how desperate is their cause. But, Mr. Chairman, it will not do that. I desire to read now an extract from a letter written by a Republican farmer in my district:

Here is what he says:

I see some of the fellows in Congress are howling "calamity." "They are whistling in their own graveyard to keep their courage up." If calamity is around here it is invisible in form and walks in gum shoes, as no one has seen or heard it. Last week I sold two ordinary steers for $90 apiece, $180. About the middle of June I sold my old corn for 83 cents a bushel, and I have the best wheat crop I ever raised, for which I am offered a reasonably good price, better than I ever did under Republican rule. All farm products command the best price I ever knew. Labor is employed, money is plenty, and people satisfied. Now, if this is the kind of calamity the Democrats furnish, I say continue to give it to us, keep it up. It may be hard on Republican office seekers, but it is good for us farmers and we are satisfied.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GOOD. What is his name?

Mr. CULLOP. Simeon Edwards, a well-known farmer, doing well, a man who never voted the Democratic ticket in his life, but who will do so this fall. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If this conduct of misrepresentation and slander about conditions is continued by the gentleman from Washington and the Republican State chairman of Indiana, what few Republicans are left in that State will become so thoroughly disgusted at their conduct that there will not be enough Republicans left in some of the counties to form election boards. That is the size of the situation out there. We are willing that the procession shall continue to move on. Now, some more prosperity items for the gentleman from Washington.

Take the city of Evansville, the second largest city in Indiana. The Republican and Democratic papers alike say that business was never better and that the people of that enterprising city are enjoying the blessings of a prosperous era and are contented with conditions and desire well enough let alone. I submit some extracts from the press of that city.

Probably the most convincing feature of the prosperous conditions in Evansville is the progress being made from a strictly financial standpoint. This second city of Indiana has 11 banks whose deposits are $25,000,000. I quote you the headlines from the Daily Courier of Evansville:

$189,210 GAIN IN BANK ASSESSMENTS—COUNTY BOARD OF REVIEW NAMES $2,143,590 AS ASSESSMENTS ON INSTITUTIONS.

The assessment of Vanderburg County banks was completed yesterday by the county board of review. The assessment is 75 per cent of the capital stock, surplus, and undivided profits. The increase of bank assessments this year over 1913 is $189,210.

Furthermore, it would seem that the passage of a Democratic currency bill has had a general stimulating effect upon the banking institutions as a whole, and I will cite you some of the most important developments in Evansville within the last few weeks which give decisive indication that the political calamity howlers had better put the soft pedal on when they get in the vicinity of Indiana's second city next fall:

Officials of the Citizens' National Bank announce 10-story office structure will be erected at once at Fourth and Main Streets.

North Side Bank two weeks ago moved into its new $50,000 building at Indiana and Main Streets.

New bank organized in the Fulton Avenue business district, marking the opening of the fifth important business district within the city limits of this prosperous city, namely, the Main Street district, the north side district, the Fulton Avenue district, the west side district, and the Howell district.

American Trust & Savings Bank two weeks ago began construction work on a two-story addition to its already magnificent bank building.

The Commercial Bank officials last week completed plans for the building of a five-story hotel on its Fifth Street property, lying adjacent to the bank.

The City National Bank recently occupied its $250,000 bank building at Third and Main Streets, said to be the finest building of its kind in the Middle West.

[From the Evansville Journal-News, Republican daily, July 3.]

FIFTY-FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS PAID FOR MAIN STREET REALTY FOR DE JONG STORE—MAX DE JONG AND SIDNEY ICHENHAUSER PAY HIGH PRICE FOR SITE BETWEEN SIXTH AND SEVENTH ON MAIN STREET TO BE USED FOR LOCATION FOR NEW STORE—SHOWS BUSINESS DEPRESSION, PSYCHOLOGICALLY OR REAL, HAS NOT AFFECTED LOCAL REAL ESTATE.

That the present business depression, whether psychological or otherwise, has had no effect on Evansville real estate values was shown Friday when a deal was completed whereby Max De Jong and Sidney Ichenhauser purchased from John W. Boehne 60 feet of Main Street property between Sixth and Seventh Streets for $55,000 cash.

The property purchased is now occupied by the H. Herman Co. at 616 Main Street, the Stahlschmidt Piano Co. at 618 Main, and the Miller store at 620 Main Street. It is understood that Mr. De Jong intends to erect a large store building there as soon as the lease on his present place of business expires. The new store will be the finest retail store in Evansville.

The deal Friday shows the increase in the value of Main Street property and that business is rapidly moving toward Eighth Street. It is impossible at present to buy property between Third and Fourth on Main, and it is impossible to get prices on property between Fourth and Fifth or Fifth and Sixth Streets. It is therefore natural that the business district must expand, and once the De Jong store is erected between Sixth and Seventh it will be but a short time until that block will be filled with modern buildings.

The erection of the Boehne Building at Eighth and Main Streets was the first move in that direction and others are expected to follow soon. Another strip of ground between Sixth and Seventh is now under consideration, and the owner has been offered and has refused $1,000 a front foot for it. The owners of the ground occupied by the Peerless Laundry are ready to erect a building suitable to Main Street, for a good tenant. Philip Holzman, according to rumor, has been offered $50,000 for the 37 feet of Main Street property where the Novelty Theater is now located.

In the opinion of Evansville business men, especially those with a knowledge of real estate values, this city is growing so rapidly that no temporary business depression can have any effect on values.

Again, I want to call his attention to a letter from a farmer residing in the district of my colleague, Mr. DIXON. It is good reading, and I commend it to the patient consideration of the gentleman from Washington. It is as follows:

FRANKLIN, IND., R. R. 4, July 6, 1914.

Hon. W. A. CULLOP,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The papers of these days contain reports of speeches made in Congress relative to the condition of the country, and to farmers in particular. According to these "prophets of evil" we are about to go to the dogs right.

As a farmer I wish to state that if dire calamity stalks abroad over the land he must wear rubber heels on his shoes and assume an invisible guise. For be it known, he has not shown up in this neck of the woods, and inquiry made reveals his absence elsewhere among the farmers.

With the greatest wheat crop in the history of the country just harvested in spite of a very great shortage of help, and the price, when the enormous yield is considered, highly satisfactory; with the price of corn higher than wheat and rapidly approaching the dollar mark in spite of those enormous shipments from Argentina, and with top-notch prices prevailing for hogs, cattle, sheep, wool, and, in fact, for everything the farmer sells, we are tolerably well satisfied with "Prof." Wilson and his "boys," thank you.

Then, too, Providence is with us. For in spite of a drouth that prevailed more or less extensively, the outlook now is for a fine corn crop. And, of course, the administration should have due credit for abundance of crops as it is charged with shortages.

That law about us borrowing money on long-time loans at low rates of interest from the Government is all right, but the trouble is we don't need to borrow much money now. We've most all got enough spare change on hand to buy a new tire occasionally.

Speaking of tires reminds me that us farmers have got a kick coming, and that is on the price we are compelled to pay for our automobiles. For we feel that the duty of 30 to 45 per cent should be removed so we can buy them cheaper. From $900 to $2,000 is too much to pay for an automobile, and yet us farmers must pay these prices. It is not fair or right to us. So we want a big reduction in autos. Also cheaper gasoline. For the putting of gasoline on the free list has not made it cheap enough for us farmers to buy for our gasoline engines and automobiles.

If the laws passed by this administration are driving the ship on the rocks, so far as us farmers are concerned, we say let her drive. If we are asleep, please don't disturb our slumbers. Let us snore.

Yours, for cheaper autos and gasoline,

A. E. SMITH.

So much for Indiana; but this ought to be enough to convince any reasonable man that there is no panic in Indiana, and, what is more, there will be none during the admirable administration of Woodrow Wilson. The people of that State believe in him and his policies, and the combined efforts of the Republican State chairman and the gentleman from Washington, so far as the people of that State are concerned, fall with a dull thud on deaf ears. They know better, and they resent their campaign of deception and slander. Again, I say to the gentleman from Washington, beware of those Indiana Republicans. They will string you and then laugh about what an easy mark you are. By all means let them alone.

Now, Mr. Chairman, some more calamity in other States. I call attention to the following item from Detroit, Mich.:

FOR THE CALAMITY EDITOR OF THE TELEPHONE.

[Special.]

DETROIT, June 28.

The Ford Motor Co. will double its plant before fall, making it by far the largest manufacturing plant of any kind in the country. Seven new buildings and a power house will be erected, the total cost being about $5,000,000.

Each new building will be six stories high, 900 feet long, and 60 feet wide.

The power house will be 85 feet high, 150 feet wide, and 240 feet long, and will house the largest gasoline engine in the world. The gigantic motor will have 30,000 horsepower.

The company plans, with its increased facilities, to double its output for 1915. When the factory is running at top speed about 40,000 men will be employed.

The present plant covers 45 acres. When the additions are completed the entire plant will be over 85 acres.

Sounds pretty good for Democratic policies.

I give another from Birmingham, Ala., that sounds prosperous:

[From the Ledger, Birmingham, Ala., June 27, 1914.]

NEWS ITEMS THAT COMPEL OPTIMISM.

The Woodward Iron Co. has sold so much pig iron since June 1 that it blew in another stack this week to help manufacture and fill orders.

Two big things for Birmingham are simultaneously in progress—the building of the viaduct at Twenty-eighth Street and First Avenue and the construction of the $1,500,000 yards and terminals of the Southern Railway.

Birmingham's citizens are pulling for the big university with a unanimity that seems to spell success.

Plans are forming for the building of a railroad from St. Andrews Bay, Fla., to Montgomery, via Chipley and Graceville, Fla., and Hartford, Enterprise, and Troy.

The city has won the title to 14 acres of North Birmingham Park. The deed has been made out. This is one of Birmingham's most beautiful park tracts.

Double-tracking of the Southern Railway system is to be continued on an indefinite basis.

Clanton is building a municipal waterworks plant.

Perry County is extending its good-roads system.

The Frisco gave an order for 32,000 tons of rails to the Ensley mill.

Crop prospects continue to be most propitious.

Auburn voted a bond issue for the location of the Lee County High School.

And here is one from New York which sounds good, and I know my good friend from Washington will enjoy it:

CARPET MILLS EMPLOYING 7,000 HANDS REOPEN.

YONKERS, N. Y., July 14.

The big mills of the Alexander Smith & Sons Carpet Co., which have been shut down for two weeks, are reopened to-day and 7,000 employees are back to work. The resumption of operations in the mills was good news to the business men of the city, as the company releases a pay roll of about $75,000 in the city each week.

Another from New York which would impress any reasonable man that the panic wave had not reached that section of the country:

Vice President Munro, of Union Pacific, says business outlook has improved remarkably in past six weeks and that country is in better shape than it has been in four years. "With the crop prospects over the country almost superperfect, I can see nothing but prosperity and lively business ahead."

And still another that has a tone of prosperity about it:

Seaboard Air Line Railway has purchased 5,000 tons of 90-pound rail and 12,000 tons of 85-pound rail for its year's requirements. The company is also asking bids on 10 mountain type passenger locomotives, 15 mikado freight locomotives, 45 passenger cars, and 325 box cars.

We must not pass by the great city of Chicago. From the Chicago Tribune, a Bull Moose organ, we take the following, which sounds well:

CHICAGO CUSTOMS INCREASE $500,000—COLLECTOR AMES SHOWS LOCAL MERCHANTS BOOSTED YEAR'S IMPORTS—LOWER AT OTHER PORTS—CUT IN TARIFF RATES RESPONSIBLE FOR REDUCTION IN GENERAL REVENUES.

That business in the Middle West is prospering more than in other sections of the country, and that Chicago merchants are importing more foreign goods than ever before are two facts shown by the report of John C. Ames, collector of customs at Chicago, for the fiscal year ending yesterday. Figures made public by the collector show the revenues of the local office for the year increased almost $500,000.

Other ports have reported that their receipts dropped during the year, and the Secretary of the Treasury recently admitted the customs revenues would fall below his expectations.

OTHER PARTS LOWER.

The showing of the Chicago office is said to be the more remarkable because of the new tariff, which went into effect last fall, and which placed many articles on the free list and lowered the duty on others. The values of the imports are not obtainable, but the increase of 5 per cent in the revenues is believed to indicate an increase of at least 10 per cent in the amount of the imports.

REVENUES OF OFFICE.

Revenues of the Chicago office for the past five years, ending June 30, have been as follows:

1914	$11,302,577
1913	10,853,703
1912	10,059,102
1911	10,882,000
1910	10,506,000

INCREASE OF $57,000 IN JUNE.

Collections for the month of June, 1914, as compared with June, 1913, show an increase of $57,000.

The importation of beef, pork, and hams and bacon from Canada has become an important factor in supplying the Chicago market since these meats were placed on the free list on October 4 of last year. Much Argentine beef is received at New York, but no entries were reported here.

Oh, now, things are not so bad in his own State as the gentleman from Washington would have the country believe. People do not erect buildings in panicky times. They make the old ones answer; but in prosperous times this character of improvement thrives, and so it is thriving in Seattle, the home of the gentleman from Washington, as the report of the superintendent of buildings shows. Here it is:

Seattle, Wash., issued building permits—
1913, Jan. 1 to June 1	4,086
1914, Jan. 1 to June 1	4,078
Valuation of buildings to be constructed under permits:
For 1913	$4,322,160
For 1914	4,720,690
Increase	398,530

F. JOSENHAUS.
Superintendent of Buildings.

Mr. Chairman, out in the Middle West these standpat calamity howlers six months ago were busy telling farmers that on account of the admission of Argentine corn free of duty it would depreciate the value of farm lands and devastation would surely follow. Within the last two weeks, in southeastern Illinois, in the district my good friend Dr. FOSTER represents—just across the Wabash River, separating Indiana and Illinois—one of his constituents sold his farm for $287.50 an acre. Never were such prices known in that locality for land under any Republican administration. It would be impossible to convince, in that case, either buyer or seller that we are now in the midst of a disastrous panic. Conditions furnish the best evidence, and the people realize that there is demand for their products. Good prices prevail and labor is employed. This is what convinces and outweighs all attempts made by the political trickster and the party demagogue to save his fast dismembering party from annihilation. Democratic policies and Democratic times inspire confidence and assure prosperity, and the combined efforts of standpatters will not prevent or even retard it. [Applause on Democratic side.]

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman begins, will he yield me enough time to read a telegram that I have here from Bloomington, Ind.?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. This telegram is as follows:

BLOOMINGTON, IND., July 3, 1914.

Hon. W. E. HUMPHREY M. C.,
Washington, D. C.:

Shower's factory here closed down four days last month for want of orders, started again last week and tried work, but had not enough orders and had to close down Friday for another week; going to start Monday and try again and hope to run part of the time with a reduced force. These are the facts. Oolitic stone industry operating not over one-third force.

WALTER BRADFUTE, Editor Daily World.

I think that that is later than the telegram read by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. CULLOP. Oh, I have one dated the 9th.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Bradfute, who signs that telegram, is also a stockholder in that company.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to also insert in the RECORD another telegram received from Mr. Will H. Hays, inasmuch as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] also referred to him.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner stated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The telegram referred to is as follows:

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., July 3, 1914.

WILLIAM E. HUMPHREY, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.:

Walter Bradfute, editor Bloomington (Ind.) Telephone, who gave us first information about Shower's shutdown, will wire you to-day exact facts about Shower's shutdown. Bradfute is also stockholder in company. This factory shut down a part of week before last; then tried to run again last week and had to shut down Friday because they had more cancellations than orders. They are now shut down, but are going to try again to start Monday, running a small portion of the time with a reduced force. They say their business is in the worst condition it ever has been. These are exact facts.

WILL H. HAYS.

THE MEXICAN SITUATION.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, among the items contained in the general deficiency bill are a number which are made necessary by reason of the policy which is being pursued by the administration in Mexico. The first of these is an item of $170,000 supplemental to the appropriation of $500,000 heretofore made for caring for a little more than 5,000 military refugees at Fort Wingate, N. Mex., and other points near the Mexican border. Three thousand three hundred and forty-eight of these people are Mexican federal soldiers and officers, 1,005 are women, and 512 are children.

Other items carried in the bill made necessary by the administration's policy with regard to the Mexican situation are $25,000 to reimburse the so-called emergency fund under the State Department. This is the fund from which special and confidential advisors and agents of the administration, such as Mr. Lind, are paid. There was available in the fund at the beginning of the fiscal year 1914 $86,000, so that the sum now appropriated, together with the amount available the 1st of June a year ago, amounts to $111,000, to which must be added $50,000 carried in the current Diplomatic and Consular bill. There are also items amounting to $325,000 for the Navy and Marine Corps made necessary by our occupation of Vera Cruz.

THE INTERNED REFUGEES.

We are caring for these interned Mexican soldiers and their families under articles 11, 12, and 13 of The Hague convention, which make it the duty of a neutral power which receives on its territory troops belonging to belligerent armies to intern them and to provide them with food and clothing and other relief required by humanity. Article 12 of The Hague convention provides that at the conclusion of peace the expense caused by the interned shall be made good.

I take it for granted that no one will question the propriety of making such appropriations as may be necessary to care for these refugees. However we may have failed otherwise in the performance of our duty as a Nation in our dealings with Mexico, we should not fail to reasonably care for these unfortunate people so long as we detain them on our soil. Nevertheless these people present one of the curious anomalies of the Mexican policy of the administration. The Hague convention places the duty we have assumed with regard to these people on neutral powers, but no one with any degree of knowledge of the policy of the administration toward affairs in Mexico will claim that the administration's attitude has been one of neutrality as between the contending forces in Mexico.

NOT NEUTRAL; NO INDEMNITY.

While Congress has preserved an attitude of neutrality and a condition of official peace with Mexico, the administration, when not engaged in acts of war such as the taking of Vera Cruz, has to a certain extent openly and notoriously and to a greater extent secretly and covertly conspired, plotted, and maneuvered for the overthrow of the federal government in Mexico and the triumph of the revolutionary forces.

This attitude, so far as it affects the interned refugees, renders our retention of those of them capable of bearing arms not an act of humanity but of further aid to the revolutionary forces. So far as the women and children are concerned, our retention of them is evidence of the fact that the administration can not trust the revolutionary authorities with which it has been cooperating and to which it has been giving aid and comfort to protect defenseless women and children of their own blood and nation.

It is not clear to me who or what government in Mexico it is expected will be bound by the terms of the protocol signed at Niagara Falls. If only the federal authorities acknowledging Huerta are to be bound by it, and that government is overthrown, the succeeding revolutionary government need not be expected to recognize our claim for the care of the refugees. If it be contended that whatever government is established in Mexico is bound by the terms of the protocol, then we can scarcely hope for a return of the expenditures made, because by the terms of the protocol we waive all "war indemnity or other satisfaction."

WHY DO WE HOLD VERA CRUZ?

A considerable portion of the sums carried in this measure are, as I have stated, rendered necessary by reason of our occupation of Vera Cruz, and a consideration of these items naturally leads to the query, Why are we occupying that Mexican port? It was taken, according to official announcement, to enforce our demands for a salute of 21 guns for the affair at Tampico. The A. B. C. mediators, who, we are reliably informed, undertook the work of mediation at the suggestion of our Secretary of State, have declared we are not entitled to a salute, and so the reason or excuse for our occupation of Vera Cruz has passed. The administration has no longer any excuse for holding Vera Cruz, except that the return of that city to the federal forces would strengthen the federal cause. As from the beginning down to the present time the administration has sacrificed American interests, American lives, American prestige, and American honor to its determination to aid the revolutionaries and overthrow the federal government, it is not to be expected that the path of honor and rectitude will be followed in this matter.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman just made the statement—and I am asking this for information, and I hope the gentleman will understand that that is my sole reason—that the mediators have determined that this Government was not entitled to the salute mentioned.

Mr. MONDELL. By paragraph B of the second article, I think it is, of the protocol, we waive all claim or demand for satisfaction of any sort or kind or any war indemnity.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman insert that in full?

Mr. MONDELL. I will refer to it more specially a little later on in my speech. In fact, I shall deal with that question at some length.

FOLLY, FUTILITY, AND BAD FAITH.

Events have fully demonstrated the folly and futility of the administration's handling of the Mexican situation. More than that; they have framed an even more serious indictment, for to the charge of folly must be added that of bad faith. Few, indeed, will be found who, in the light of events, will attempt to commend or indorse the fruits of the policy thus far pursued. There are some, however, who, overlooking the manifest and notorious failure of that policy in the production of satisfactory results, in the protection of life and property, in the restoration of peace, have been inclined to refrain from criticism on the theory that, at least, the policy has been pursued in good faith, futile and fruitless of results as it has been.

But even these half-hearted and wholly negative defenses and excuses are no longer tenable in view of what has transpired. The President took pains to remind Congress in his message delivered at the beginning of the present session that we are the friends and champions of constitutional government, and he would, I assume, have us understand that the attitude of our Government in its dealings with the Mexican situation was actuated by a desire to aid in the establishment and maintenance of a government constitutional in basis and form.

At the suggestion of our Secretary of State, so we are reliably informed, the mediation conference came into being. The only government in Mexico not purely revolutionary, the only government having any claim of constitutionality, is that of which Huerta is the head. Through the insistence of our delegates the representatives of the Huerta government, for the sake of peace, agreed to the elimination of Huerta as the head of the federal government. The only way under the constitution of Mexico in which a constitutional succession could be established was by the appointment by Huerta of some satisfactory person as his secretary of foreign affairs, who by the resignation of Huerta as President would succeed temporarily and provisionally to that office.

ADMINISTRATION AGAINST CONSTITUTIONALISM.

This plan of constitutional succession was vigorously, emphatically, and persistently opposed by our administration, with the result that the mediators and the Mexican delegates reluctantly waived insistence upon this necessary constitutional procedure pending the selection of an individual to be agreed upon for provisional president. The names of a number of men of high character and standing in Mexico who had kept aloof from the present struggles were suggested, but the American delegates were instructed and it is reliably stated that the President himself insisted that no one should be agreed upon to temporarily assume the reins of power in Mexico except an avowed and notorious partisan of the revolutionary cause.

It seems altogether probable that those at the head of the revolutionary forces might have been influenced to accept a presidential succession under constitutional forms, but the all-powerful influence of our administration was brought to bear to defeat such an arrangement. It is as well established as such a matter, guarded by diplomacy, can be that the revolutionary forces and authorities would have agreed to the appointment of a neutral in the present conflict as provisional president under constitutional forms had not the all-powerful influence of our administration again stood against such a reasonable and constitutional arrangement.

The administration, while claiming to base its Mexican policy on a desire to encourage and promote government along constitutional lines, has been aiding and abetting the revolutionists on the theory that they were adherents of constitutional government. The utter disregard of the rules of civilized warfare of the chieftains of the revolutionary cause, their marauding and plundering, their contemptuous refusal to give satisfaction or even reasonable explanation of outrages brought to their attention by our consular agents has made it very apparent to all the world that they are constitutionalists in name only.

The recent summary arrest and imprisonment by the agents of Villa of the officers in the State of Chihuahua who had been appointed or chosen under the forms prescribed by the revolutionary movement itself and his appointment in their stead of his own partisans affords the clearest proof that these rival chieftains have no sort of regard for constitutional forms. Following all this comes the declaration from constitutionalist headquarters that the plan they are operating under, the so-called plan of Guadaloupe, contemplates only a military despotism until they shall have extended their plan of rapine and plunder over all Mexico.

The developments of the situation have thus clearly revealed the mockery and hypocracy of the administration's pretenses of desire to aid the establishment and maintenance of constitutional government in Mexico. The administration's policy, so far as it can be dignified by such a designation, has clearly had but one end and aim—that, the overthrow of the federal government in Mexico. To the accomplishment of this one purpose the wanton destruction of American lives and property in northern Mexico by the forces of the revolution have been overlooked, and the very men responsible for these outrages have been aided and abetted, petted and patronized by the administration.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is it agreeable to the gentleman to yield there for an interruption?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARRETT, of Tennessee. The language the gentleman has used is "the destruction of American lives by the constitutionalist forces."

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Can the gentleman name a single American life that has been taken by the constitutionalist forces under military order?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, the gentleman asked me if I can give the name of any American life that has been taken——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Or any person.

Mr. MONDELL (continuing). By the constitutionalist forces under military orders. The life of any American taken or the life of anyone taken in time of war by war order would be prima facie supposed to be taken under military law. I do not have any cases of the taking of the life of an American citizen by military tribunal, but the gentleman knows as well as I do that the lives of scores, if not of hundreds, of Americans have been lost in northern Mexico during the troubles there. Americans have lost their lives by the tens and by the scores, if not by the hundreds, as the gentleman knows, in the territory under the control and at the hands of people giving allegiance to the so-called constitutionalist cause. I recall only one case, that of a Texas stockman—Veragua, if I remember the name rightly—whose life was said to have been taken by the Federal forces or those favorable to the Federal cause. Northern Mexico, more than half the Republic, has been swept by the bandit forces owing allegiance to the so-called revolutionary cause, and they have been plundering, pillaging, and murdering, and committing all manner of horrible crimes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MONDELL. Our administration has overlooked all that, and by the protocol have agreed that we shall not ask satisfaction or indemnity.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will be brief—I can not unless I can get a little more time.

Mr. GILLETT. I have not any more to yield.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I can not yield any further, because I have not the time to conclude what I have to say.

THE EMBARGO ON ARMS.

The embargo on the shipment of arms into Mexico, solemnly declared by the President under authority of Congress, has been repeatedly violated apparently without objection from and probably through the suggestion, aid, and connivance of officials whose duty it was to enforce it. I realize how serious a thing it is to charge an administration with conniving at the violation of its own orders, but if this has not been done all along the border then public opinion there has been grievously misled and misinformed.

The evasion of the purpose and intent of the embargo by the Antilla and other vessels and the connivance of those high in the counsels of the administration in such evasion is recent and notorious. In the case of the Antilla the aid and encouragement given by our officials went to the point of threatening the Mexican Federal Government with summary reprisal if attempt was made to prevent her landing her cargo of guns and ammunition at Tampico.

The letters of Capt. Sherbourn Hopkins were not needed to prove that officials of the administration were engaged in either overlooking or actually encouraging the violation of the embargo on the shipment of arms which the administration had in response to an insistent public demand established.

In the carrying out of the administration's policy of aiding the revolutionists and eliminating Huerta hundreds of Americans were left to their fate at Tampico, as our ships reluctantly weighed anchor and moved out to sea on the peremptory order of the Secretary of War. To eliminate Huerta the finest and one of the largest fleets ever assembled steamed under forced draft to Mexican waters. To prevent ammunition from reaching the Mexican Federal Government we violated our treaty with Mexico and sacrificed the lives of nearly a score of our brave boys and took the lives of several score of Mexicans in the taking of Vera Cruz.

Now that poor, distracted Mexico is having a brief respite from slaughter, from pillage, plunder, and murder while the revolutionary chieftains are endeavoring to adjust their differences so as to leave each in the best possible situation to overcome and destroy the other when a more opportune time shall arrive, the opportunity is presented of reviewing and summing up the devious pathway of the administration's dealings with Mexico and its results.

It is now clear that the loss of heroic men and good money at Vera Cruz was unjustified, unnecessary, and fruitless of results—that it was all sacrifice and no gain. Having plunged the country into acts of war at Vera Cruz on a flimsy pretext, after supinely submitting to every form of indignity offered to Americans by the constitutionalists of the north, the aid of the representatives of our South American neighbors was invoked by the administration in the hope, I assume, that they might extricate us from the difficulties into which the follies of the administration had plunged us, or at least keep up the appearance of mediation until the so-called constitutionalists, with the aid and encouragement of the administration, might extend their theater of devastation to the City of Mexico.

THE FRUITS OF MEDIATION.

The fruits of mediation to date are a protocol of three articles agreed to by the representatives of the United States and Mexico. The most significant of these is subdivision (b) of article 2, under which the United States waives the right or claim to indemnity or satisfaction of any sort or kind from the Government or people of Mexico.

What an abject surrender upon the part of the administration from its stiff-necked demand for a salute of 21 guns and an abject apology is this agreement to demand no satisfaction or indemnity whatever for incidents on account of which the administration rushed a mighty fleet over the seas, sacrificed American lives, and now maintains a hugh fighting force amid the dangers and the discomforts of the Tropics.

No satisfaction? No indemnity? What about the Americans who have lost their lives in Mexico? What about the millions of dollars' worth of American property that has been destroyed? What about the lives and property of the citizens of other countries for which, under the Monroe doctrine, we have assumed responsibility? What about the lives of our gallant men who fell at Vera Cruz? The millions which the taking and holding of that port has cost us? Are we to have no recompense, no satisfaction, not even an explanation or apology for all these losses? It would seem not, for whoever else may or may not be bound by the terms of the protocols, we certainly are. Thus has a policy begun in inane vaccilation, pursued in malevolent meddling, continued in truckling partisanship to the insurgent cause, and characterized all the while by insincerity, double dealing, and Pecksniffian hypocrisy, finally closed the present chapter with a truly characteristic surrender of American rights.

MAY SETTLE HER OWN DIFFICULTIES.

Recent dispatches from the City of Mexico inform us of the appointment by President Huerta of Francisco Carbajal, of the Mexican Supreme Court, as minister of foreign affairs, and state that should Huerta resign and Carbajal thus succeed him as provisional president the constitutionalists would acknowledge the administration of Carbajal and peace would be restored. If there be any truth in this statement, it will prove that the Mexicans themselves are more disposed to adhere to constitutional forms than our administration, which has laid such stress on them. If peace shall be thus established in Mexico, it will be in spite of rather than by reason of the machinations of our administration.

If, however, events should follow their probable course, and in the immediate or more remote future the rival constitutionalist chieftains, after carrying their campaigns of plunder to the City of Mexico, shall fly at each other's throats and begin anew the sanguinary and sickening programs of plunder and pillage, such an outcome will be but the logical result of the administration's policy.

NO CREDIT FOR THE UNITED STATES IN ANY EVENT.

Whatever may be the outcome, the miserable mess and muddle which constitutes the administration's record leaves no chance or hope for honor or credit for the part we have taken in the unhappy situation in Mexico.

Mr. TAGGART. Will the gentleman indulge me to ask him a question?

Mr. MONDELL. I am sorry, but I have not the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MONDELL. If I can get a little extension of time, I will be glad to yield. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts give me five minutes more? I need about five minutes to close.

Mr. GILLETT. My time is all promised, but I will yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. I will answer the gentleman, if he will be brief.

Mr. TAGGART. What does the gentleman think ought to be done?

Mr. MONDELL. Now?

Mr. TAGGART. Yes; now.

Mr. MONDELL. I think the administration has made such a mess of it that I would want a little time to think it over before I can think of any plan that would bring satisfactory conditions out of the awful mess and muddle into which the administration has brought matters. Northern Mexico, where many of our people lived, where they have homes and valuable properties, is in desolation. Homes are wrecked and property destroyed. At the best it will take a decade to establish normal conditions and a generation to overcome the prejudice which has been engendered.

The open and notorious as well as the secret and covert aid and assistance given by our administration to the so-called constitutionalists will not only permanently prejudice us in the eyes of all who have upheld the Federal Government, but, as an example of what we may be expected to do in other contests that may arise in Mexico, will tend to make all classes of the Mexican people suspicious of us and fearful of our disposition to take sides in their local affairs. We may reasonably expect the permanent hostility of those whose cause in Mexico our administration has made every effort to overthrow, and we can not hope for the confidence or friendship of those who realize that the sum of our aid and comfort to them measures our perfidy and double-dealing with others.

No part of our past glorious history is brighter than that which has had to do with the management and conduct of our foreign relations. Courage, dignity, straightforwardness, not to mention such elementary virtues as honesty and truthfulness, have heretofore universally characterized our foreign dealings. We turn with relief from the contemplation of the humiliating spectacle which the present management of our foreign relations with Mexico, with Colombia, with England relative to the Panama Canal presents to the glorious days of Seward and Olney, Blaine and John Hay. Cheered by the recollection of American diplomacy of their days, we take comfort in the fact that the present policy of insincerity, of folly, of prejudice of American interests and surrender of American rights can last but two years longer at the most. [Applause.]

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. GILLETT. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

THE TARIFF AND TRADE-UNIONS—A QUESTION OF WAGES.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, the question of protection is simply a question of wages. Years ago James G. Blaine, standing on the floor of this House, declared, "The tariff question is essentially a question of wages." The great industrial development in this country in the years that have intervened since that statement was made abundantly attest its truth.

So, too, the question of trade-unions is essentially a question of wages. In brief, the demand of organized labor is for an eight-hour day, a standard wage scale, and that when more than eight hours is exacted for a day's work additional pay shall be given for the extra work. It claims that goods manufactured by nonunion workmen and in unfair shops, where a lower wage scale is mainained and longer hours of service are demanded for a day's wage, ought not come in competition with the goods produced by union labor. It demands of its members and sympathizers that they shall not purchase or use goods manufactured in such unfair shops.

It is plain to be seen therefore that trade-unions and the tariff alike are essentially questions of wages. It is a significant fact that to-day trade-unions are recognizing more thoroughly than they have ever recognized before how utterly inconsistent and futile it is to protect labor and leave the product of labor unprotected.

DOMESTIC AND FOREIGN WAGES COMPARED.

On the 25th day of March, 1914, the Daily Consular and Trade Reports, a Government publication, edited by the Hon. William C. Redfield, Secretary of Commerce, contained an article from the American consul at Liege, Belgium, giving the wages paid labor in firearms and ammunition factories. The laborers so employed, as described in that article, embrace not only common laborers, but also the highest skilled laborers in both wood and metal. This scale of wages was so low that it attracted my attention and caused me to send the report to Brig. Gen. Crozier, Chief of Ordnance, United States Army, requesting him to furnish me a comparison of the wages paid in Belgium with the wages paid by him in the Government arsenals, where he employs several thousand men in the manufacture of similar articles. Gen. Crozier's reply, together with the comparison made by him, is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ORDNANCE,
Washington, April 1, 1914.

Hon. JAMES W. GOOD,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Subject: Comparison of wages paid in Belgium with those paid in the United States in the manufacture of firearms and ammunition.

1. Answering your note of the 28th ultimo, inclosing a copy of the Daily Consular and Trade Report for March 25, 1914, inviting attention to the statement therein contained of the wages paid laborers in the firearms and ammunition factories of Belgium, and requesting a statement of the wages paid in the Government arsenals for similar employment, I inclose herewith two statements prepared in this office, one showing a comparison of the wages paid in Belgium—as stated in the Consular and Trade Report—with those paid at the Springfield Armory, Springfield, Mass., in the manufacture of firearms, and the other giving similar data with reference to the manufacture of ammunition, the latter statement showing the wages paid at the Frankford Arsenal, Philadelphia, Pa., which is the Government's ammunition factory. The Springfield Armory is the Government's small-arms plant.

2. I am also returning herewith, as requested, the copy of the Consular and Trade Report received with your notes.

Respectfully,

WILLIAM CROZIER,
Brigadier General, Chief of Ordnance, United States Army.

Again, on June 18, 1914, the Daily Consular Reports, page 1160, gives another picture of wages paid to European workmen. I refer to the report of American Consul General Ethelbert Watts, at Brussels, from which I quote the following:

The average weekly pay in Belgium of mechanics, machinists, and toolmakers is 35 francs ($6.75), helpers 20 francs ($3.86), and usually time-and-a-half pay for overtime. The workday is 10 hours, 6 days a week. If a mechanic loses an hour or more on account of sickness, lateness, etc., it is the custom to deduct it from his pay.

Mr. Chairman, upon receipt of the information from Gen. Crozier I made a speech in this House, on April 21, 1914, in which I compared the wages paid to workmen in this country and in Belgium. That speech evoked some little discussion and even criticism on behalf of a labor organization in New England. The criticism was to the effect that in comparing wages I had failed to make a comparison of the cost of living in the two countries. I recognize the justice of this criticism, for, after all, it is not so much what a man receives for his day's toil as it is what he can purchase in the community where he labors with the wage he receives. Any comparison of the wages paid workmen in this country with like wages abroad which does not include a comparison of the cost of living and the condition of the laboring classes in the respective countries is incomplete and is subject to criticism.

ACTUAL AS WELL AS NOMINAL WAGES GREATER IN UNITED STATES.

Having on that occasion given only nominal wages, I desire now to make some comparisons as to actual wages paid to American and European workmen. I approach this subject with some misgivings, for I realize how difficult it is to compare the prevailing retail prices of the necessaries of life in one country with similar prices in other countries. In making such a comparison one is confronted at once with a multitude of objections, any one of which would destroy the value of such comparison. For illustration, there is no uniformity in the grading of articles which comprise the necessaries of life which has international recognition.

It has occurred to me, therefore, that the best method of determining the relative cost of living here and abroad is to compare in a broad way the everyday life of the laboring classes. The important thing to determine is whether the American laboring man, when his labor is protected by adequate tariff duties, gets more of the good things of life for his toil than the European workmen who work under a free-trade system. Even this comparison as applied to laboring classes, which comprise the great bulk of a country's population, is unjust to the United States, for it eliminates the element of saving of the American workmen, the dollar left over. While this element is an important factor with the American workmen, with the European, except in isolated cases, this does not exist.

Applying this standard of measuring the cost of living in this country as compared with European countries, we are appalled at the result. While American workmen receive, as was shown by the report of Gen. Crozier, from two to six times the wages received by European laborers, yet if our workmen here voluntarily live the life of self-denial which the European laborer is compelled to live their cost of living is no more than the cost of living abroad.

A few years ago Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, visited Europe for the purpose of making a study of the conditions of workmen there as compared with workmen of this country. His report was published in the American Federationist of January, 1910, and from that report I quote the following:

Mentally contemplating the many cities I visited, and having in mind the conversations I had with workingmen who had lived both in Europe and America, I believe I may assert that whether the cost of living in Europe or America is greater to the workingman depends entirely on the standard of living he adopts while in America. If he voluntarily lives the life of self-denial in this country that he compulsorily lived in his native land, his outlay of money will remain about the same. Even then he will hardly be able to escape gaining something for the superior supply of the good things of life in America.

Living is cheap to the wage worker in Europe only because he does without what in America soon becomes a necessity to him—food in good quantity and quality, presentable clothes among his aspiring fellow workmen and their families, and a comfortably furnished home in quarters responding to his awakened desires for equality with his American neighbors, and in general a large and freer life.

"How often do these people eat meat?" is a question the American in Europe finds himself asking when looking about among the wage workers. Meat is usually from 25 to 100 per cent higher in price than in the United States. * * * The cheapness and abundance of many varieties of fruits and of our melons and tomatoes is a surprise to him. Closely after the most pressing necessities comes a line of things cheaper than in Europe—cotton clothing, including overalls, jumpers, shoes—the American shoe has a sale all over the Continent—newspapers, the cent buying twice to four times the reading matter contained in a German, French, or Italian paper. Access to good water renders expenditure for alcoholic drinks less common.

It may be said that Samuel Gompers is an American, and on this subject a prejudiced witness. Let me call as witnesses, then, men whose reputation for scholarly attainments are known throughout the world. I shall call some noted Englishmen to portray the condition of the workmen of their country. Listen to their testimony:

SOME ENGLISH OPINIONS ON LABOR CONDITIONS ABROAD.

JOHN RUSKIN: Though England is deafened with spinning wheels, her people have not clothes; though she is black with the digging of fuel, they die in cold; and though she has sold her soul for gain, they die of hunger.

JOHN BRIGHT: Nearly one-third of the whole people dwell in homes of only one room, and more than two-thirds of the people of Scotland dwell in homes of not more than two rooms. We find poverty and misery. What does it mean? It means more than I can describe and more than I will attempt to describe; and as need begets need, so poverty and misery beget poverty and misery. In fact, in looking at the past, to me it is a melancholy thing to look at; there is much of it which excites in me not astonishment, but horror. The fact is there passes before my eyes a vision of millions of families—not individuals, but families, fathers, mothers, and children—passing ghastly, sorrow stricken, in never-ending procession from their cradles to their graves.

BENNET BURLEIGH: There is no gainsaying the existence, rich and potent as the British Empire is, of widespread privation among the working classes of Great Britain. This distress has now become a constant, an aggravated, quantity. Men, women, and children, by hundreds of thousands, miserably half clad, have to face the chill English winter, hibernating as best they can in dark, frowzy abodes, from which they emerge but to plead for bread.

JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN: The class of agricultural laborers of this country (Great Britain) are never able to do more than make both ends meet, and have to look forward in times of illness or on the approach of old age to the workhouse as the one inevitable refuge against starvation. The ordinary conditions of life among the large proportion of the population are such that common decency is absolutely impossible; and all this goes on in sight of the mansions of the rich.

JOHN MORLEY: It is an awful fact—it is really not short of awful—that this country (Great Britain), with all its wealth, all its vast resources, all its power, 45 per cent—that is to say, nearly one-half—of the persons who reach the age of 60 are or have been paupers. I say it is a most tremendous fact, and I can not conceive any subject more worthy of the attention of the legislature, more worthy of the attention of all.

THOMAS CARLYLE: British industrial existence seems fast becoming one huge poison swamp of reeking pestilence, physical and moral—a hideous living Golgotha of souls and bodies buried alive. Thirty thousand outcast needlewomen working themselves swiftly to death. Three million paupers rotting in forced idleness. And these are but items in the sad ledger of despair.

Prof. HUXLEY: A population whose labor is insufficiently remunerated must become physically and morally and socially unstable; and though it may succeed for a while in industrial competition, by reason of the cheapness of its produce, it must in the end fail, through hideous misery and degradation, to utter ruin.

[From Leslie's Weekly, April 30, 1914 (American authority).]

Recently, in London, a large conference of influential people, representing society, the church, and every political party, was called by the Duchess of Marlborough to unite with the women workers in a protest against the "sweating" system. Factories and workshops in Great Britain give employment to 2,000,000 women and girls and at least 100,000 more work in their homes. After mentioning $3.75 a week as the amount estimated for the minimum requirements for a single woman, the Duchess of Marlborough said that in organized industries there were probably 300,000 who earn less than $3 a week, while there are many who earn only $1.50 a week. A shirt maker in the meeting produced a shirt for the making of which she was paid 18 cents a dozen. By working from 5.30 a. m. to 11 p. m. this woman and her husband made in a week $2.62; out of this they had to pay 37 cents for the machine and 45 cents for cotton, leaving the net wages of the two for one week's work $1.80. We have nothing like this in the United States.

These witnesses have told the story of how English workingmen live. This testimony impresses me with the fact that the problem of the English workmen is not the "high cost of living," but rather of how to keep from starving. I have, with one exception, quoted English authority on conditions in England, for the reason that England is a free-trade country, and the cost of living there would be as low there as in any European country.

We have seen how workmen live in the Old World; let us inquire how they live here. Let us turn from this picture of despair and misery to look upon one of hope, promise, and advancement. That we may see ourselves as others see us, I shall call as witnesses not Americans, but rather some of the illustrious writers and historians of Europe. This is what they say of our laboring classes:

EUROPEAN OPINION ON LABOR CONDITIONS IN UNITED STATES.

JAMES BRYCE: The native workpeople are, of course, fairly educated, they read the daily newspapers, while their women may take a weekly religious journal and a weekly or monthly magazine; many of them, especially in the smaller cities, belong to a congregation in whose concerns they are greatly interested. Most are total abstainers. Their wives have probably had a longer schooling and read more widely than they do themselves. In the smaller towns, both in New England and the West, and even in some of the large cities, such as Philadelphia and Chicago, the richer part of them own the houses they live in—wooden houses in the suburbs, with a little veranda and a bit of garden—and thus feel themselves to have a stake in the country. Their womankind dress with so much taste that on Sunday, or when you meet them in the steam cars, you would take them for persons in easy circumstances. (The American Commonwealth.)

PIERRE LEROY-BEAULIEU: The census returns thus confirm the common opinion that the wages paid in the United States are, on an average, the highest in the world. I believe I am warranted in saying that this is the case in respect not only to the nominal but to the actual wages. Of the three great needs of man—food, clothing, and shelter—the first is assuredly satisfied at less cost in the United States than in Europe, as is the second, for clothes—and particularly machine-made footwear—may be bought there at very low prices. Lodging, however, is very much higher, and perhaps the additional expenses incurred under this item offset the saving possible in food and clothing. Still, everything considered, there can hardly be any doubt that actual wages, like nominal wages, and almost to an equal degree, are higher in the United States than in Europe.

WILHELM VON POLENZ: And it is the possibility of getting on in life which give a peculiar stamp to the working classes of America. A people which has seen Presidents, inventors, multimillionaires, and bank directors rise from the ranks knows no limits to its hopes and demands. The man in a small way of life in America has higher pretentions in the matter of furnishing and comfort of his home. In the luncheon basket of the mason may be found such food as roast beef, tarts, tomatoes, pudding, and melon—food that with us is only found on the table of the middle classes. (The Land of the Future.)

ALFRED MOSLEY: That the American workman earns higher wages is beyond question. As a consequence, the average married man owns the house he lives in, which not only gives him a stake in the country but saves payment of rent, enabling him to increase his savings or to purchase further comforts. Food is as cheap if not cheaper in the United States as in England, whilst general necessaries may, I think, be put on the same level. (American versus English Working Conditions.)

CHARLES WAGNER: In this effort of civilization America holds the record, and it must be added that nowhere is industry more honored than in that land. Through his own efforts a man may attain to anything, and it is the men who are the sons of their own achievements that occupy the first place in the general esteem. (My Impressions of America.)

DIOMEDE CARITO (on his return voyage): I approached and entered into a short conversation during which I experienced an emotion of patriotic joy such as I had seldom felt in all my life. A few years before those peasants had left our country ignorant and unable to read or write, and were therefore slaves in the true sense of the word. For is not ignorance slavery? When they returned to their country these humble Pariahs of the earth brought with them a little capital in American money, and, what is more, a little portion of the spirit of the country whence they returned—if I may say so—entirely humanized. * * * And when the discourse turned on North America, on the country which their labor had helped to fertilize, it was a hymn of exultant praise of the Odysee which had taken them to new shores, to new and brighter horizons, which had cleared their minds and enabled them to rise toward the heights of human dignity. They returned no longer slaves to the humble plot of ground, but with means to become proprietors of a piece of land; to ascend one step on the social scale. (In the land of Washington.)

HUGO MUNSTERBERG: It can not be doubted that the American laborer is a different sort of creature from the continental laborer; his material surroundings are different, and his way of life, his dwelling, clothes, and food, his intellectual nourishment, and his pleasures would seem to the European workman like luxuries. The number of industrial laborers in the year 1880 was 2.7 millions, and they earned $947,000,000; in 1890 it was 4.2 millions, earning $1,891,000,000; and in 1900 there were 5.3 millions laborers, earning $2,320,000,000; therefore at the time of the last census the average annual wage was $437. This average figure, however, include men, women, and children. The average pay of grown men alone amounts to $500. This figure gives to the German no clear idea of the relative prosperity of the workingman without some ideas of the relation between German and American prices.

The average laborer lives on the same plane as the German master artisan; and if he is dissatisfied with the furnishings of his home, it is not because he needs more chairs and tables, but because he has a fancy for a new carpet or a new bathtub. (The American.)

A. MAURICE LOW: Labor in the United States is more liberally recompensed than in any other country. Workingmen can be broadly divided into two classes—the skilled worker, who has served an apprenticeship and is a master of his craft, and the unskilled laborer, who does work requiring brute strength rather than intelligence. The former constitutes the hierarchy of labor and wields great power in the management of trade unions and in improving the general condition of labor; the latter is usually unorganized and exerts little influence.

The factory system was early transplanted from England and is coincident with the general expansion of industrial occupations in the United States. Without attempting to raise the political or economic question, whether the protective system in America has been the cause of high wages or whether, as American free traders are fond of asserting, the wages of American workingmen would be equally as high without protection, owing to superior natural advantages, the fact remains that the American workingman is better paid than the workingman in any other country. (America at Home.)

E. LEVASSEUR: Taking everything into consideration except rents, the ordinary objects consumed by the laborer's family, quantities and qualities the same, cost rather more in France than in America, and this is particularly true of Paris as compared with New York. In consequence the average American workman enjoys a real as well as a nominal income which is probably more than twice as great as that of the French workman.

Real wages being higher in the United States, the American workman lives more comfortably than the European, certain grades of English labor excepted. He has acquired settled habits of consumption and enjoyment; his food is more substantial than that the workman of continental Europe; he dresses better; he is more comfortably lodged, and often owns the house in which he lives; he insures his life; and, if provident in his own way, he spends more for amusement and upon the societies with which he is affiliated; in other words, he has a higher standard of life than the European workman. Such a condition is one of the most desired results of civilization, and the American people are justly proud of it. (The American Workman.)

The testimony of these notable witnesses, whose experience covers a span of more than half a century, is an inspiration, and is certainly conclusive of the fact that Samuel Gompers was right when he said—that whether the cost of living in Europe or America is greater to the working man depends entirely on the standard of living he adopts while in America. If he voluntarily lives the life of self-denial in this country that he compulsorily lived in his native land, his outlay in money will remain about the same.

HIGH WAGE SCALE IMPOSSIBLE WITHOUT PROTECTION.

We have thus seen that the cost of living abroad is as high as in the United States. The difference between workingmen here and abroad is the difference in the wages they receive. Our workingmen receive from 2 to 6 times more wages than the European workmen receive. Why? Why is the European workman, year in and year out, confronted with the problem of poverty, cold, hunger, and starvation? Are we not all largely of the same blood? Have we not all the same ambitions? Has not the English factory system been transplanted in this country? Why, then, should our laboring men enjoy vastly superior advantages and comforts? Why is it that we annually receive from Europe more than a million men, women, and children? Every year witnesses an increasing number of immigrants flocking to our shores. They have learned in the hard school of adversity that Europe offers only starvation wages to her workmen and that America offers vastly more. European workmen understand that not only nominal but actual wages are higher in this country than in any other country in the world. That tells the whole story. They are attracted here by our higher wages and superior advantages.

Wages are higher here, because the policy of protection to American workmen recognizes and guarantees a higher wage scale and a higher standard of living. The policy of the Republican Party has always been, and still is, to maintain tariff duties that will measure the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad. This difference consists almost entirely of the difference in the labor cost. In building up an industrial system under that American policy the American manufacturers can and do pay their laborers higher wages than are paid abroad. With an increased wage the American laborer demanded a higher standard of living than the world had ever known. As that standard of living advanced the demand for increased wages, for shorter hours, and for improved conditions surrounding the workmen came from the trades-union.

ACCOMPLISHMENT OF TRADES-UNIONS.

The organizing of laboring men in this country into trades-unions has done much to improve the conditions of labor, but let us always remember that it was the American policy of protection that made the accomplishment of the trades-unions possible. Without protection our manufacturers could not have paid the high wages which our laboring men now enjoy. Their product would then have come into free and open competition with the unfair and underpaid labor of Europe. Without trades-unions the workingmen would not have received this high wage scale which protection made possible. If unionism alone is responsible for the superior wages paid our workmen, why is it that in England, where labor is highly organized, laboring men are compelled to live in the most deplorable conditions? But in England the hours that constitute a day's labor are longer, and the pay the union men receive is much less than in this country. If protection is not the cause, what is the reason that our workmen are so much better paid and better fed?

UNDERWOOD TARIFF LAW UNFAIR TO LABOR.

For the past nine months we have been operating under a law enacted by a Democratic Congress which greatly reduced the tariff duties on foreign-made goods imported into this country. This law was enacted in response to a direct promise of the Democratic Party to reduce the cost of living. After a fair trial of more than nine months no one will seriously contend that this law has reduced the cost of living to the consumer in any appreciable degree. But who will not admit the Underwood law has seriously reduced the power of the American laborer to earn a livelihood? Its real effect has been to injure the American laboring man, and to improve the conditions of labor abroad. During the month of April, 1914, our purchases of foreign-made goods exceeded our purchase of such goods in April, 1913, by more than $36,000,000. During the same month our exportation of American-made goods was $37,000,000 less than in April, 1913, a loss in a single month under the Underwood tariff act of $73,000,000, most of which would have been paid in wages to the American workingmen.

It certainly can not be contended that a law which changed a growing balance of trade in our favor to a balance of trade against us is a good thing for American labor. In view of this large increase in importation of foreign-made goods that are taking the place of domestic-made goods, it might be well to inquire whether the foreign-made goods imported into this country under greatly reduced tariff duties are manufactured by laborers who are members of trades-unions; whether they were manufactured in unfair shops; whether they were manufactured by children under 14 years of age; and whether they were manufactured in the sweatshops and prisons of Europe. In Italy over 50,000 children work in textile factories 10 hours a day at an average wage of less than 10 cents; in Japan 60,000 children work 12 hours a day in textile industries at an average daily wage of less than 7 cents; while in India more than 60,000 children are employed making carpets at a daily wage of less than 5 cents. These children are all under the age of 14 years, and if their product is to come into open competition with the product of the American trade-unionist, what is to become of organized labor's demands? Can we long protect labor if we leave the product of labor unprotected?

PROTECTION AND UNIONISM HANDMAIDS OF LABOR.

It is a most encouraging sign that the rank and file of organized labor in this country is realizing that unions are useless if the product of union labor is to be brought into open competition with underpaid nonunion labor, child labor, and even convict labor of Europe. The inconsistency of a program which protects our laborers only against their American competitors is un-American and is unworthy of the rank and file of any organization. Trade-unionists should stoutly object to the product of their labor being brought into open competition with the product of nonunion and unfair labor, and for this reason, mindful of their own interests and of the high object of their organization, they will not vote to bring the product of the unfair and underpaid labor of Europe into open competition with the product of their own labor.

American laboring men are of a high order of intelligence, and they are beginning to realize that a man ought to have what he votes for, so long as his vote is cast with the majority. The man who votes to reduce the cost of living in this country to the same low level of living costs in Europe can not object to living under the same conditions and working for the same wage that confronts the European wage earner. We can not have high wages for labor if the product of labor is cheap. We can not have steady employment for labor here if our people buy their supplies made in sweatshops abroad. When one buys an imported article, what assurance has he that it was not made by unfair labor? If it is right to boycott goods made in this country by nonunion men, is it not equally right, aye, is it not a duty to boycott goods made in the sweatshops of Europe by children, by unfair and underpaid labor, and even by convict labor? The American workmen ought to be protected to the extent that the goods which he produces should not be displaced by goods made by unfair, underpaid, nonunion workmen of Europe. This being true, what more effective method can be devised to protect American labor from this unfair competition than the Republican policy of protection? It made unionism possible. It made possible the wage scale enjoyed by our workmen, which is the highest scale of wages paid to workmen the world over. If the many advantages that trade-unions have gained are to be preserved to the laboring men of this country, this can only be done by maintaining the policy of protection to American labor and American industry. These two policies have given labor its dignity and independence, and the day is rapidly approaching when American labor throughout our broad land will cease to oppose these principles and will champion with vigor and enthusiasm these two great American policies—protection and trade-unions.

Mr. GILLETT. I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

[Mr. LA FOLLETTE addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KINKEAD].

Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I desire to bring to the attention of the House this afternoon a dispatch from Bayonne, N. J., published in one of the great daily papers of our State. It demonstrates how another great mercantile institution feels regarding the retirement and the pensioning of faithful employees. Bear in mind that the company which plans these betterments is a subsidiary of the well-abused Standard Oil Co., and, standing alone, this change in their system means little; but I want to remind this House, Mr. Chairman, that this is but one of many powerful institutions in New Jersey which have adopted a retirement and pension policy for their superannuated employees. To recall offhand a few of these progressive, humane, and energetic concerns, let me mention the Pennsylvania Railroad, the Public Service Corporation of New Jersey, and the Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co., of Jersey City; and may I not direct your attention to the fact that these organizations are noted for honesty in the handling of their stockholders' funds? My point is, Mr. Chairman, that we are now demanding a higher standard of honesty and efficiency from big business. In so doing I believe we are acting wisely, and I know that the legislative program which is now being considered by this body will unquestionably redound to the great and lasting good of the Nation.

But it is strange that "soulless" corporations should blaze the way for this great Government in the proper pensioning of faithful employees.

PENSION AND INDEMNITY PLAN FOR OIL CO. EMPLOYEES.

A new system of indemnities and pensions for the employees of the Tide Water Oil Co., of Bayonne, has gone into effect.

When hurt in accidents employees will receive partial or full wages for varying periods, according to disability. The company will provide hospital, medical, and surgical expenses.

Employees with the company 25 years and 65 years old will be retired on pension on application. Those employed 20 years will be retired on approval of a committee of the directors. Those 70 years of age who have been employed 20 years or more will be retired automatically. The pensions will be based on 1 per cent of the average wage earned for 10 years preceding retirement multiplied by the number of years of service, but no pension will be less than $20 a month. Pensions of deceased employees will be paid to the widows or minor children for 1 year. When requested the company will pay funeral expenses.

I believe that the United States Government should set an example to the other nations of the world in an endeavor to settle all disputes by reason instead of by force.

I believe that the United States, in its capacity of employer, should set an equally good example to the corporations of the country in its treatment of the employed.

Through the work of President Wilson, ably and intelligently carried out by Secretary of State William Jennings Bryan, we are now making treaties with the nations of the world agreeing that all future differences that might arise between us and other nations should be submitted to an international tribunal before we resort to force.

In my judgment, we are far behind some of our so-called soulless corporations in our treatment of the men in the Federal service.

If the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. and the Public Service Corporation of New Jersey and other corporations can adopt a pension plan for their superannuated employees, certainly this Government of ours can well afford to follow in their wake. In conversation with Mr. Hartford, president of the Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co., a short time ago, he informed me that their company had a pension appropriation of $15,000 yearly for the men who had faithfully served their company and who were now too old to take care of themselves.

We are demanding of the corporations a higher standard of business morality; we are demanding a strict adherence to the Sherman law, but the Government allows itself to be outdistanced by the men of the progressive corporations of the United States with regard to the treatment of employees.

I am anxious to see this order of things changed; I am desirous of seeing the Federal Government lead in an honest effort to render life's burden less arduous to the men in our employ than it is at the present time. And it is for this reason that I am heartily in favor of a pension system which will be just alike to the Government and to employees.

I might enlarge and talk of the honest and efficient service rendered by our Federal employees; that, however, would take more space than I shall attempt to use in the present discussion. Suffice it for me to say that I believe that the people of the eighth district of New Jersey desire me to support a retirement plan for our Federal employees, and I propose to reflect their sentiment when the matter comes before Congress by my vote thereon.

Mr. BARTON. Mr. Chairman, the tariff is one of the oldest unsolved problems of our country. We have three distinct schools of thought, each honestly believing that they have the correct theory. Many tariff bills have been tried, and in the judgment of the American people have been found wanting. One school believes in the old Democratic doctrine of free trade; other Democrats have abandoned that theory and now stand for a tariff for revenue, or, as Mr. UNDERWOOD styles it, a competitive tariff, while Republicans and Progressives in their platforms have a tariff just high enough to represent the difference in cost of production at home and abroad, believing that it is necessary to lay such a tariff to protect the industries and the workingmen of this country against a lower standard of living and wages in foreign countries.

Democratic Representatives from congested centers rise in their places and proclaim that the cost of living has been reduced as per the promises of the majority party. Those from agricultural districts rise and proclaim that the prices to the farmer have not been reduced. The different speeches made to circulate in that particular section the Member represents; but fine-spun theories and statements without basis are not effective among the people of to-day, for we represent a constituency that are intelligent and of an inquisitive turn of mind. Facts and conditions are to them the best evidence.

The workingman who pays his grocer, butcher, and other necessary living expenses will know whether wages are good, work plenty, and the cost of living reduced.

The farmer who takes his produce to the market will know without the advice of some politician when he sells his cream, butter, eggs, cattle, corn, hogs, wheat, vegetables, and other farm produce if the price is good, and he will also know from practical business tests whether the money he gets for his produce will purchase the goods he buys at a proportionately lower figure.

You Members who voted to take practically all the tariff off the stuff he produces should have examined into the condition of the average farmer of to-day. He does not pick his money off of the trees, gather butter from buttercups, extract milk from milkweed, nor get honey from the honeysuckle; he does just plain common everyday hard work and lots of it; he does not go to work at 9 o'clock in the morning, quit at 4, take every Saturday afternoon off and six weeks vacation in the hot months; he toils. Not even with the certainty of a Government or other employee is his compensation assured. He takes a chance of rain and hail, of winds, storm, and flood, of insects and all the vicissitudes of nature, and how much profit does he get for this hard work and hazard? Let an extract from Bulletin No. 570, issued by the Department of Agriculture, tell you.

Five hundred and thirty-seven dollars and fifty cents. If he belonged to a labor union and was working for a corporation, he would strike. Were it not for the fact he raises most of his food he would be bankrupt. His yearly income, as shown by this report, would not buy the cigars of the men who wax rich in handling or gambling on his products, and yet he is the man that in the construction of the Underwood tariff bill was made the sacrifice.

Our farmers know that every bushel of grain, every pound of food product, every dollar of agricultural commodities that are thrown into the American markets by foreign countries displaces just that much of his product.

The Department of Commerce sends us a monthly statement of the imports and exports, and I insert here a statement showing the imports of farm products for the past eight months

Sending money to a foreign country enriches foreigners at the expense of our people. Do not you think that the farmer will ask you who are responsible for this law why, if it is a tariff for revenue only, you discriminated against Schedule G—the farm schedule—which was the third revenue producer in this country? He will ask why you did not lay a duty in such a manner as to let it apply equally to all business, his included. He will ask why you protected 80 per cent of the products of New Jersey and only 35 per cent of the products of Nebraska, 71 per cent of New York and 30 per cent of Kansas, 89 per cent of Rhode Island and 20 per cent of Wyoming, 87 per cent of Connecticut and 12 per cent of Nevada, 63 per cent of Maryland and 9 per cent of Arizona.

In fact, why did you draw the line and collect a tariff on only 36 per cent of the products west of the Mississippi River? You said that the intention was not to destroy a legitimate business. Are not the cane growers of Louisiana doing a legitimate business, and will you contend that their business has not been destroyed? A hundred million dollar sugar industry in that State put out of business, 20 great sugar mills, and the planters at that place know not where to turn. Are not the beet raisers and beet-sugar producers of this country doing a legitimate business? Mr. FORDNEY, in his speech of July 1, made these statements, and no answer has yet been placed in the RECORD:

The reduction of duty as provided for in the Underwood tariff law, sanctioned and approved of by the administration, on Cuban sugar is a fraction over one-third of a cent per pound. This change or reduction of duty was made effective March 1, 1914. Its effect so far has been to close the following beet-sugar factories:

In Ohio, the Continental Sugar Co., with a slicing capacity of 500 tons per day, and the Altowa Sugar Co., with a capacity of 600 tons per day.
In Nevada, the Nevada Sugar Co., slicing 500 tons.
In Arizona, the Southwestern Sugar Co., 650 tons capacity.
In Wisconsin, the Rock County Sugar Co., 700 tons capacity.
In Iowa, the Iowa Sugar Co., 500 tons capacity.
In California, the Alameda Sugar Co., 800 tons capacity; the Sacramento Valley Sugar Co., 700 tons capacity.
In Colorado, the Holly Sugar Co., 600 tons capacity; the Las Animas Sugar Co., 700 tons capacity; the American Beet Sugar Co., 400 tons capacity.
In Michigan, the Western Sugar Refining Co., 600 tons capacity.
Twelve factories in all out of a total of 74 in the United States, or about 16 per cent of our beet-sugar factories, have already been driven out of business.

Is not farming a legitimate industry; and if you really wanted to reduce the cost of living why did you not go to the proper place to do this instead of free listing the products of the man who your own Department of Agriculture says only makes $537.59 after a year's hard labor?

The high cost of living is not due to the farmer getting too high a price for his product. He was just getting to a point where he had some chance to get ahead, and no man on earth deserves to prosper more than he. It is due to the stock gambler who plays with prices as the other gambler with his cards and victims, and to the middleman who gets from 50 to 500 per cent profit before it reaches the table of the consumer; with all this food product brought into this country you have not reduced the price to the consumer; it does not necessarily mean that to reduce the price to the farmer you have reduced the price to the consumer. Take wheat for an example; you have cheapened the price to the farmer. Is bread cheaper? You have brought 10,000,000 bushels of corn into this country, making the price of American corn cheaper. Have you reduced the price to the consumer of corn products? No; the middleman is the beneficiary and the Government the loser in revenue. In other words, you invite foreign importations to force down the prices of farm products and permit importers to enrich themselves at the expense of the farmer and consumer.

The money that goes to Argentina for corn and beef, that goes to Mexico and Canada for cattle, meat, wheat, oats, rye, barley, potatoes, and hay; that goes to Australia for wool, beef, and mutton; that goes to China for eggs, builds no homes, builds no schools, builds no churches, pays no wages, and pays no debts in the United States. It goes to a foreign country, and goes to stay. The farmer was against Canadian reciprocity. How, then, in the name of justice can he submit to a wholesale free list with all nations without reciprocity? I know the American farmer will see the injustice done him. I know he will understand that he has been made the goat of this tariff bill. And I firmly believe he will support men and parties that give him equality with all other American industries, all other American people, and a preference as against the foreigners.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ADAMSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 17824) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1914 and for prior years, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I present the conference report on the District of Columbia appropriation bill,

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] presents the conference report on the District of Columbia appropriation bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 10523. An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr PAGE] asks for the immediate consideration of the conference report, the rules to the contrary notwithstanding. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, this is very important legislation. It seems to me that we ought to have more Members present than are here at this time, and I feel that I must object.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Will the gentleman allow me? The resolution adopted some time ago continuing appropriations was for 15 days. It expires to-morrow. To-morrow is Calendar Wednesday, and ordinarily we could not consider this conference report on to-morrow, and unless it is considered and passed in the House to-night and goes to the Senate, an objection having come from his side of the House this morning to continuing the provisions of this resolution, necessarily there must be one day when there will be no provision for the District of Columbia. If the gentleman will allow me, the leader of the minority, who is temporarily out of the Hall, has discussed with me several times these three matters in disagreement. If he has in mind any objection that he might have to this final report, he will find, I think, the things he was contending for are embodied in it. I hope the gentleman will not object. It is a matter that personally I care no more about than he does, but it seems to me that it would bring about confusion and a very considerable difficulty if this bill were not passed by the House to-night.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I am very much interested in this bill, and we all are. The affairs of the District of Columbia must not be allowed to get into a more unfortunate condition than they have by reason of the failure of this bill up to this time. I do not entirely like the ground on which the gentleman bases his suggestion that I should not object, namely, that there was objection on our side this morning to the consideration by unanimous consent of the resolution to extend the appropriations. I think there were very good reasons for that objection—very excellent reasons. I think the presence of this bill here now is proof positive of the effect of that objection. If that objection had not been made, the probability is that the District bill would not have been agreed to.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Then why destroy the purpose of the objection by objecting now to the result of that objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that to-morrow is Calendar Wednesday, and therefore this bill could not be taken up, and that we are all interested in having the appropriation bill passed, I shall not object.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think it would be fair to call attention to the fact that it is 5 o'clock in the afternoon, and there are not more than 25 Members present. At the same time, Mr. Speaker, in calling attention to that fact, I wish to say that, for myself, I recognize the extreme importance of this bill becoming a law to-day. I do think, however, it is very bad business management to bring such an important measure up at such a time when a single objection would kill it and when the scant attendance of itself gives reasonable ground for such an objection. I feel myself that the result of the conference is fairly satisfactory, and therefore I put the responsibility on the majority and will not object.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. DONOVAN. The regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I hope the gentleman from Connecticut will withdraw that.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] whether the committee has reported against the payment of $2,000 to one Keller?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Yes. The Senate has receded absolutely from that amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. Then I have no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have the bill before me, but what disposition is made by the conference report of what is known as the Borland amendment?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. There is an agreement on the Borland amendment, a modification of the original Borland amendment, embodied in the report.

Mr. COX. Did the Senate finally yield on that?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Yes; they yielded largely.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] demanded the regular order. The regular order is, Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] to consider immediately this conference report without having it printed? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT NO. 964.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10523) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 31.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 226 and 227, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 28, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

Omit the matter inserted by the House amending said Senate amendment, omit the matter stricken out by said Senate amendment, and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"Hereafter whenever under appropriations made by Congress the roadway of any street, avenue, or road in the District of Columbia is improved by laying a new pavement thereon or completely resurfacing the same, not less than one square in extent, from curb to curb, or from gutter to gutter where no curb exists, where the material used is sheet asphalt, asphalt block, asphaltic or bituminous macadam, concrete, or other fixed roadway pavement, such proportion of the total cost of the work, including all expenses of the assessment, to be made as hereinafter prescribed, shall be charged against and become a lien upon the abutting property, and assessments therefor shall be levied pro rata, according to the linear frontage of said property on the street, avenue, or road, or portion thereof upon the roadway of which new pavement or resurfacing is laid: Provided, That there shall be excepted from such assessment the cost of paving the roadway space included within the intersection of streets, avenues, and roads, as said intersections are included within the building lines projected, and also the cost of paving the space within such roadways for which street railway companies are responsible under their charters or under law on streets, avenues, or roads where such railways have been or shall be constructed.

"The assessments hereinbefore provided for shall be levied in the following proportion, namely: One-half of the total cost upon the abutting property owners and the remaining one-half and all of the expenses of maintenance and repairs to be paid from the revenues of the District of Columbia and from the Treasury of the United States in equal parts: Provided, That where the width of the street, avenue, or road to be paved or completely resurfaced from curb to curb or gutter to gutter, as the case may be, shall exceed 40 feet, the excess, including the cost of intersections or spaces within which street railways are required to pave, shall be paid for one-half out of the Treasury of the United States and one-half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

"Assessments levied under the provisions hereof shall be payable and collectible in the same manner and under the same penalty for nonpayment as is provided for assessments for improving sidewalks and alleys in the District of Columbia, as set forth on page 248 of volume 28, United States Statutes at Large: Provided, That the cost of publication of the notice of such assessment upon the failure to obtain personal service upon the owner of the property to be assessed therein provided for and of the services of such notices shall be paid out of the appropriation for the work, and such assessments, when collected, shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the United States and the District of Columbia in equal parts."

And the House agree to the same.

T. U. SISSON,
C. R. DAVIS,
Managers on the part of the House.

JOHN WALTER SMITH,
LUKE LEA,
J. H. GALLINGER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

STREET RAILWAYS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to file an amended report on the bill (H. R. 15191) to provide for the acquisition, ownership, and operation by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia of all the street railroads located in the District of Columbia. (H. Rept. 917.)

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the amended report will be filed.

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill, H. R. 10523, the District of Columbia Appropriation bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an article on "Safety at Sea, and Liability of Vessel Owners for Losses at Sea," by Thomas I. Parkinson, of Columbia University, published in the Survey of July 4, and to extend my remarks briefly on the same subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the article named. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the general deficiency bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the general deficiency bill. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 17824) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1914 and for prior years, and for other purposes, with Mr. ADAMSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the general deficiency bill.

Mr. GILLETT rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] is recognized.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, on the 6th of July this year, at the first convening of this House following the 4th of July, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP], who has just made such an emphatic statement on agricultural product values, rose in his place and asked that he be given the privilege to extend his remarks in the RECORD by having printed therein a speech delivered by the President of the United States on the 4th day of July, 1914. The speech was at Independence Square, in the city of Philadelphia. Unanimous consent was given. It was a notable speech, by a notable man, on a notable occasion; but perhaps the one sentence challenging the greatest attention of the press and public in that interesting address was as follows:

I have heard a great many facts stated about the present business conditions, and it is strange that these facts as stated do not tally with each other.

The President of the United States, whom we all honor, both for himself and for the position he occupies, is entitled to receive careful statements of fact concerning business conditions from whatever source. But more especially should he be warranted in relying on the statements which go into the great CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Especially should this be true when those statements are made by a professed friend.

I was very much interested in the fact that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] was selected to present that presidential speech to the House. Again, I was very much interested this afternoon when, in accordance with the custom of recent days, he ranged himself on the floor as chief lieutenant for the administration's principal defender, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

The greatest business fact existing in this country at this time is the wheat crop of this country. It is the largest business fact of the United States. It is, perhaps, the most important business fact of the world. It is a business fact to which men of all vocations, whether transportation, industrial, or commercial, are looking for the removal, at least in part, of the so-called world-wide depression, referred to recently by our Secretary of Commerce; a depression which we took such pains a little over a year ago in this House to open our gates to, so that we might absorb and secure a great deal more than our fair share of that world-wide depression; a depression that in 1912 was world-wide except in the United States.

Wheat coming from the northwest in a golden stream is expected to neutralize the effect of that stream of gold now leaving our shores. It is hoped to set at work one hundred thousand of the quarter million idle freight cars, and aid the railroads hereafter to run into terminals instead of receiverships. It will doubtless give employment to a large number of men who for the last few months have been unemployed. It is expected to work wonders by statesmen in power in neutralizing the havoc which their ill-considered legislation has wrought. Even the wheat farmer until recently hoped that he might obtain out of the abundance which came from a benign providence and his own industry something more than the actual cost of production. Of this largest business fact in this country the President of the United States is entitled to have the truth.

It was on the 4th day of June of this year that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] rose in his place and discussed the prices paid for wheat. This is the language. You will find it on page 9821 of the RECORD:

Wheat now is a better price under Democratic times than it was in 1912 under Republican rule.

I waited some time to see whether the gentleman would correct that statement. I thought perhaps the statement, so astounding, might not have been given credence. But I had occasion to discuss that fact with a number of my eastern colleagues, who seemed to have accepted the statement as correct.

Now the partisan reference made to this time in June, compared to two years before, is a challenge he had a right to submit, and we gladly accept, because June, 1912, fairly represented the prosperous times and good farm prices under a protective tariff and Republican administration, and the date of his speech fairly represents the change his party has wrought. But what are the facts? When the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] stood on the floor of the House giving the price of wheat on the 4th day of June and stated that it was higher than it was two years before, wheat at Omaha was 88½ cents per bushel; June 4, 1912, it was $1.08½. When he made the speech, looking past every obstruction into the eyes of his colleagues, on June 4, 1914, wheat at Kansas City was 91½ cents, while on June 4, 1912, it was $1.12, a difference of 20½ cents per bushel. When, in fine scorn of the facts, he made the speech, wheat at Minneapolis was 93¼ cents; on June 4, 1912, it was $1.12⅜. The vulgar fact that wheat in Chicago was 96 cents a bushel on June 4, 1914, while two years before that it was $1.11½ did not halt him. New York's price of $1.05¼ in 1914 and $1.21¾ in 1912 did not even modify his emphasis. These are cash prices quoted on No. 2 hard, except at Minneapolis, where the prices are on No. 2 northern.

Average decrease in five markets, 18 cents per bushel.

If these dates are regarded as too narrow; if the gentleman desired to give facts concerning prices, he could have resorted to a broader field, using the records of the United States Department of Agriculture. The wheat farm prices quoted are for January, February, March, April, May, and June of the several years. I place them in two groups—one for the years 1914 and 1913 in one group and the other for the four preceding years. I group 1913 and 1914 together because the anticipatory effects of one go with the actual results of the other.

The average price for the first group of four years under the old tariff was for January 93.3. It was 78.6 for the other. For February it was 95 for the four-year group, 80 for the two-year group. March it was 96.2 as compared with 83, and so on, with an average between these two groups of years, covering fairly all of the six months, of 16 cents per bushel in favor of the former law. So that a man desiring to find the truth could not have been easily mistaken, as the following table will show:

Price of wheat per bushel.

It seems to me that a zealous pursuit of the truth as to the price of wheat would have sent the gentleman to the papers of the great city of Indianapolis, the capital of his own State. Indiana possesses its great capital city and the gentleman from Indiana, and it is proud of one of them. When he made his speech on the 4th day of June, 1914, wheat was there quoted at 96½ cents, while two years before it was $1.17.

I quote these figures from the Indianapolis Star, a paper I have heard quoted three times as authority by the gentleman from Indiana, who, I regret to say, is absent at this time, after having made his remarkable speech this afternoon concerning the price of farm products.

The gentleman from Indiana again, on June 27, 1914, stated, page 11261 of the RECORD:

> Farm products are commanding a high price, the best ever known.

The farmers of the country undoubtedly wish this were true. They would be very glad to have the statement made good.

I submit the following table of leading product prices on June 27, 1914, in several markets:

If market prices are not fully convincing, allow me to submit the following table showing the farm prices for small grains during the first six months of the last six years, grouped as heretofore, and the decrease in price for the last two years compared with the four years previous.

Farm price of certain small grains, 1st of each month, for the United States for years 1909, 1910, 1911, 1912, and average for these four years as compared with the price for same months for 1913 and 1914, and the average for these two years:

Should we see fit to consider May the month preceding the gentleman's statement, the following table of important farm products for 1912 and 1914 will be of interest:

All the foregoing information was available to the gentleman at the time he made his statements. It may, however, be of interest to submit a table showing the wheat prices of a recent date compared with two years ago.

The fall of price in wheat during the last two years has been more than 15 cents per bushel. The difference in average price between the period including 1913 and 1914 and the period of four years preceding is in excess of 15 cents a bushel. The difference in price between June 1, 1914, and the average price for a period of five years preceding that date is 15 cents a bushel. The reduction of the tariff in the Underwood bill was 25 cents per bushel for those countries that receive our wheat free and 15 cents a bushel for the products of countries which do not admit our wheat free. The importation of wheat for the first eight months of the Underwood law increased 357 per cent over those of the corresponding period one year before. It may be interesting to know the effect in dollars and cents to the average wheat farmer of the country, the several States, and the different counties in my congressional district what a fall in price of 15 cents a bushel means.

In considering the relative prices of wheat and other grains during the last two years it is entirely proper to call attention to the fact that prices of farm implements used in securing these crops be given. Upon the authority of the Hon. C. B. Dempster, of Beatrice, Nebr., president of the leading farm-machinery factory west of the Mississippi River, I can state that there has been an advance of price to the retailer during the 12 months preceding June 1 of this year of wagons, plows, disk harrows, grain drills, and so forth. There has been a tendency to advance in price windmills, pumps, and similar farm appliances. I give, however, in detail, the prices quoted and obtained by the International Harvester Co. for the years 1912, 1913, and 1914, the same being based f. o. b. cars Chicago, Ill.

Weber wagon, 2-horse	61.50	65.00	65.00

It will be interesting further to know the course of prices of binding twine during the last three years which the farmer must use in taking care of his crop. It has increased as will appear from the following table of prices quoted by the International Harvester Co.:

	Sisal.	Standard sisal.	Manila.	Pure manila.
1912	7¼	7¼	8½	9¾
1913	9¼	9¼	11½	12½
1914	9	9	11	13¾

Is it any wonder that the farmer, pressed between the upper millstone of falling wheat prices and the lower stone of rising machinery and binding twine prices, has little patience with statements upon the floor of the House at such variance with well-known market facts. The farmers know that the majority party so drafted its recent tariff law as to make them bear its burdens and suffer from its injuries. They resent the gratuitous insult in the assumption on the floor of this House that farmers do not remember back a period of two years, and that they do not know their own markets. Free trade statesmen will learn that farmers' memories are in working order while their forgetters are decayed and rusting. As ex-President Roosevelt well said:

> As for the farmer, the present tariff, the administration's tariff, was so framed as to result in the sacrifice of his interests. He had no spokesman, no friend in high quarters, and his welfare was contemptuously sacrificed. At every point where his interest was concerned he was made to suffer.

Talk of distinguished gentleman on the floor of this House can not by mere audacity and emphasis change markets nor can it close the minds of farmers deeply interested, nor convince them that 15 to 20 cents a bushel decrease in price of their wheat really makes it higher. They know that they pay their bills, reduce their mortgages, and buy their lands by the increase in their receipts and not their decreases.

That psychology which makes a debt an asset causes a deficit to appear as a surplus, converts a "bust" into a "boom" they do not understand or take any stock in. The gentlemen whose duties it were to have seen that the farmer had fair treatment in tariff readjustment may be compelled to content themselves this fall with psychological majorities which do not carry certificates of election. Because it will be recalled that two of the great political parties—Republican and Progressive—declared that the farmers should receive protection equally with all other industries. And the third, the majority party, gave no notice to the farmers of the United States, through their Baltimore platform, that their products should be placed upon the free list. Reduction was promised; removal was not. But they recall the first table appearing in the Underwood tariff bill report which charges farm products to be the principal offender in the matter of high prices. This was made the excuse for placing nearly all farm products on the free list and making approximately 80 per cent in value of American articles recruited to the free list by the Underwood tariff law come from the farm. Moreover, on page 18 of that report appears the following committee prophecy over the signature of every member of the majority of the Ways and Means Committee, including the gentleman from Illinois:

> In our judgment the future growth of our great industries lies beyond the seas.

We are having the fulfillment of that prophecy. Agriculture is our greatest industry, and that committee has done its utmost to cause its greatest growth in Canada, Argentine, and Australia. Perhaps the best proof of this is the fact that while the increase of finished or manufactured imports during the first eight months of the operation of the new tariff law amounts to only 8.8 per cent, the increase of the following leading farm products which were placed upon the free list or given rates radically reduced for same period as compared with a similar period one year before is 149 per cent:

Cattle; horses; sheep; animals; bread and biscuits; corn; oats; wheat; hay; beef and veal; mutton and lamb; pork; prepared and preserved meats; bacon and ham; all other meats; sausage and bologna; sausage casings; milk and cream, fresh and condensed; butter and substitutes; cheese and substitutes; eggs; vegetables—beans, onions, peas (dried), potatoes, all others in natural state; wool, unmanufactured.

So the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] may claim credit of being a prophet, but he carries no profit which would bring credit or cash to the American farmer. And yet this should not have authorized the gentleman from Illinois making such dire threats as he did on the 27th day of June, 1914, against anyone on this side forecasting conditions which even a wayfaring man, however mentally unequipped, must see. It was a grotesque sight on that day to hear the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] try to limit the manner of speech on the minority side, while the gentleman from Indiana went the limit. Of course these gentlemen are kindred souls, having much in common both in personal charm and mental characteristics. They have been doing great team work to excuse themselves from the outrage which they aided in perpetrating, in formulating, passing, and now defending the agricultural schedule of the Underwood bill. The gentleman from Illinois insists upon a monopoly of the right to prophesy business conditions. The writers of Indiana have almost a monopoly on the fiction of literature. It appears that the gentleman from Indiana would try to give that State a corner upon the fiction of legislation.

The gentleman from Indiana is a genial and interesting statesman from a great State. It is the State which Edward Eggleston once credited with a "schoolmaster," and later Booth Tarkington vouched for the citizenship of the "gentleman from Indiana." From the gentleman's qualities of mind, manner, and mien we must regard him as the combination of the two, scholar and statesman, two in one, the dinne patriot. But with all this, many of his admirers would be pleased to see him get his facts on straight in regard to wheat. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I have no apology to offer for my partiality toward farmers or for my deep interest in legislation to promote agriculture.

My constituents are largely farmers, and their chief industry is agriculture.

My first duty is to them, and my highest concern is the prosperity of the industry from which they secure support.

Over 40 per cent of the population of the United States reside upon the farms. The welfare of so large a percentage of our population is a matter of great national magnitude.

Agriculture is a basic industry. All other industries depend upon it for support. Aid to agriculture is aid to all. Agriculture is a national business. The decadence of agriculture means national decay, national deterioration, national weakness, national inferiority, and national dependence; growth of agriculture means national development, national expansion, national progress, national prestige, national power, national superiority, and national supremacy.

BUYING FOOD ABROAD.

It has not been many years since it was the common boast in this country that we could feed the world. Yet for the fiscal year just ended June 30, 1914, we unquestionably actually purchased more foodstuff from abroad than we sold abroad. Official statistics for the fiscal year which ended June 30, 1913, show that in value the exports of all foodstuff from the United States exceeded the imports by but $97,000,000. The official figures for the entire fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, have not yet been compiled. There has been, however, a large increase in the importations of foodstuff into the United States, including food animals, by reason of our new tariff policy, which places many farm products on the free list. We have sufficient data now to show that for the year just passed the people of the United States have purchased more foodstuff from abroad than they have sold abroad. This indicates that agriculture in this country is losing its position as our chief industry and we are driven to the pitiable position of asking other nations to help feed us. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that this brings to this Congress, to this Nation, to this people, a most important question—what shall be the national policy of the United States toward agriculture? It is sufficient, it seems to me, to constrain the National Congress to consider in the most serious manner what means and methods the National Government may adopt and what laws the National Congress may enact to promote the expansion and prosperity of our agricultural interests.

EUROPEAN AGRICULTURE.

Mr. Chairman, in 1913 two commissions from the United States went abroad to study agricultural conditions in Europe. One went under the auspices of the Southern Commercial Congress; the other was appointed by the President under an act of Congress.

The American commission in its report says:

> Thirty years ago European agriculture was in a bad way. To-day it is fair to say, from the European point of view, its agriculture is prosperous.

This revolution in agricultural conditions in Europe—this change from prostration to prosperity—has not been due to accident, but has been due largely to favorable legislation, to efficient administration, and to wise economical policies pursued by European nations.

European governments have aided agriculture along four general lines: First, in providing facilities for instruction in scientific agriculture; second, in levying tariff duties to protect their farmers in their home market from foreign competition; third, by the organization of their farmers for business purposes; and fourth, by providing their farmers with ample credit at a low rate of interest. Great Britain is the one important European country that has neglected agriculture, and her course stands as a monument to the folly of her statesmen.

The United States should profit by the experience of European countries. We should adopt the methods and pursue the policies which have contributed so effectively to the prosperity of European agriculture.

What has the United States done to aid agriculture along these four lines? First, in agricultural education we have been a leader among nations. No other country has facilities equal to those in the United States for instruction in agricultural science. No other country expends so large amount of money for agricultural education. Our appropriations for the support and the equipment of the Department of Agriculture are annually increasing. The agricultural appropriation bill this session carries over $19,000,000. We have recently passed the Lever bill which contemplates the expenditure of many millions of dollars in farm demonstration work. No one contemplates a backward step in agricultural educational work. Our appropriations must be continued, enlarged, and extended until every farm has been brought to a high state of productivity, and until every farmer has attained a high degree of prosperity.

PROTECTION.

Second, the United States, like many European nations, has done much to promote agricultural prosperity through protective tariff duties upon agricultural products. We fostered industrial development through the same policy. Great manufacturing centers were developed. Mighty cities grew into existence. The land became dotted with prosperous towns and villages, inhabited by well-paid and intelligent American citizens, employed in mills and factories. This process went on until we had 60,000,000 of people residing in our towns and cities. Our farmers possessed a great home market—the best in the world. This added value to their lands and enhanced the prices of their products. The prosperity which our farmers have enjoyed during the past 15 years has been due not to any material increase in the yield per acre of their lands, but to the higher range of prices received for their products. But, alas, the party now in power enacted a new tariff law and entered upon the policy of free trade in farm products. By so doing, the United States discarded one of the most potent and effective instruments used by most of the great European countries to promote agriculture. We abandoned a policy which has contributed immensely to our agricultural wealth and to the prosperity of our farmers. Free trade in farm products is a great national blunder which should be rectified at the earliest date possible.

ORGANIZATION IN BUSINESS.

Third. The United States Government has done little to organize its farmers for business purposes. In this respect we are far behind European Governments. Cooperative business methods have contributed immensely to agricultural prosperity in most of the European countries. Germany has more than 25,000 farmers' cooperative societies. Unquestionably too large a percentage of the wealth produced by the farmers of the United States goes to corporations and individuals engaged in the purchase, transportation, manufacture, sale, and distribution of farm products. Certainly our farmers should be able to market their crops and secure more than 46 per cent of the price which the consumers pay. The Federal Government must aid the farmers of the United States in perfecting methods and means whereby they may market and distribute their products to consumers, without submitting to unjust, undue, or unfair tribute levied by corporations.

AGRICULTURAL CREDIT.

Fourth. What has the United States done to provide credit for its farmers? Practically nothing. Long ago continental European countries recognized the importance of ample credit and reasonable interest as instruments for the development of agriculture. Rural-credit institutions were established, and through them agriculture has expanded, large profits have accrued to farmers, great wealth has been added to nations, improved social conditions have been developed, farm life has been made more attractive, and, above all, new hope, higher aspirations, better living, and greater happiness have come to millions of European farmers.

The Republican Party was the first political organization to recognize the importance of rural credit, and it was the only party that placed in its platform in 1912 a positive declaration in favor of the enactment of State and Federal laws to provide credit for our farmers. In its national platform promulgated at Chicago, June 22, 1912, the Republican Party declared as follows:

> It is of great importance to the social and economic welfare of this country that its farmers have facilities for borrowing easily and cheaply the money they need to increase the productivity of their land. It is as important that financial machinery be provided to supply the demand of farmers for credit as it is that the banking and currency system be reformed in the interest of general business. Therefore we recommend and urge an authoritative investigation of agricultural credit societies and corporations in other countries and the passage of State and Federal laws for the establishment and capable supervision of organization having for their purpose the loaning of funds to farmers.

This plank in the Republican platform of 1912 covers the entire ground. First, there is a recognition of the social and economical importance of rural credit; second, credit for the farmers is placed upon an equal footing with credit for general business; third, authoritative information is demanded; fourth, there is an appeal for immediate constructive legislation in the following language:

> We recommend and urge * * * the passage of State and Federal laws for the establishment and capable supervision of organizations having for their purpose the loaning of funds to farmers.

The leaders of the Democratic Party, now directing national legislation, apparently have not recognized the wisdom of the Republican platform declarations. This Congress has been in session continuously for 15 months. The Banking and Currency

Committee have reported no rural credit bill to the House. Practically all other business was sidetracked for nearly 6 months while Congress had under consideration the new banking and currency act. When this act was before the House I offered an amendment authorizing the organization of rural banks "to provide the farmers of the United States with better credit, cheaper interest, and larger capital with which to develop the agriculture of the United States." In a speech supporting my amendment I said:

You are providing a currency for merchants, for manufacturers, for business men, for bankers, for speculators, for capitalists * * * and letting the farmers go. * * * You are putting the cart before the horse. The first thing you should do is to take care of the great agricultural interests of this country.

This session of Congress is drawing to a close. It is generally understood no rural credit bill be reported at this session of Congress. The short session of next winter will expire in three months by limitation of law. It will be crowded with other business. Rural credit bills will have little chance for consideration. Unless called in special session, the Sixty-fourth Congress will not convene until in December, 1915. Under the program outlined by the party in power what reasonable prospect is there of rural credit legislation until late in the year 1916? In the meantime our farmers must wait while other great interests are being cared for; agricultural development will be retarded and farmers will not be able to enlarge their farming operations for lack of capital and must continue to pay a much higher rate of interest than is being paid by the farmers in European countries. Against this program I want to enter my earnest and emphatic protest, and I appeal to the leaders of the Democratic Party now in power to report a rural credit bill, give it the right of way in this House, and let it be passed before this session of Congress shall adjourn.

OUR CREDIT INSTITUTIONS.

What are the credit institutions of this country? All told we have 29,254 banks; 25,993 reported to the Comptroller of the Treasury. These banks have $1,560,000,000 cash in their vaults, $2,096,000,000 capital stock, $2,249,000,000 surplus and undivided deposits, $20,033,000,000 invested in loans and securities, and $25,712,000,000 in resources. They have loaned and invested $10 for every dollar they have in capital, and they have loaned and invested $14 for every dollar they have in cash.

These banks are credit institutions. They are the custodians of the credit of the country. Credit is a mighty instrument of power in the commercial and industrial world. Only through its expansion has our great material development been made possible. As a factor in our material development credit should be ranked with the mighty natural forces of steam and electricity. Trade, transportation, commerce, mercantile, and industrial enterprises have largely monopolized the credit power of our banks. The object of rural credit legislation is to create credit for agriculture. Its purpose is not to rob commerce Its object is to supply agriculture, to create a new credit for our farmers, to place in their hands an instrument of productive power that will extend, expand, and enlarge their industry, increase their earning power, add to their profits and savings, multiply their wealth, and thus increase by a hundredfold the wealth of the country from which all other industries and classes will reap untold benefits. Rural credit banks do not mean opposition or antagonism to existing commercial banks. Rural credit banks mean the establishment of a new enterprise, the founding of a new institution. Their effect will be like the building of a new mill, the erection of a new factory, the opening of a new mine—to aid and assist all other business and to distribute blessings to the entire community. One great fact should be thoroughly understood—without adequate credit agriculture can not keep pace with the expansion of commercial and industrial enterprises. The very strength and perpetuity of our Nation depend in a large measure upon the maintenance of a proper equilibrium between commerce, manufacturing, and agriculture. To attain this great end we are justified in exercising all the constitutional power vested in Congress.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. SLOAN. In the plan of rural credit that the gentleman presented, was there any provision made for nonland-owning farmers, known as tenants?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. In answer to the question of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] I will state that in the limited time which has been allotted to me at this time I will not be able to discuss the various systems of rural credit which have been adopted by most of the European countries. My great object now is to impress upon Congress the importance of action. The details and extent of the system we will establish will be a matter for discussion when the matter is up for consideration. But my own views are that the system should provide some way whereby tenants with limited means could become the owner of a farm without the sacrifice and struggle for himself and family which they would have to make under the present system. Not only should it include the tenant farmer, but should extend in its scope to include the farm laborer and wage earner in the towns and cities who desire to go to the farm and make better provision for himself and family, but is also ambitious to participate in what should be a great national patriotic movement to promote agricultural development.

REDUCTION OF INTEREST.

One great object of rural credit is the reduction of the interest charge upon existing indebtedness of farmers. The census of 1910 reports only the mortgage indebtedness on farms operated by their owners. This amounts to $1,726,173,000. Estimating according to their number the amount of mortgage indebtedness upon farms not operated by their owners, there is a total farm mortgage indebtedness in the United States of $2,300,000,000 The census does not show the amount of money farmers have borrowed on personal securities or how much credit they have obtained from merchants. The total amount of personal indebtedness of farmers is unquestionably very large. Competent judges have estimated that the farmers of the United States owe from four to five billions of dollars, upon which they pay an annual interest charge of probably $400,000,000. European farmers borrow money at from 4 to 5 per cent annual interest. American farmers pay an average rate of from 7 to 8 per cent. If through rural credit farmers could secure a reduction of 3 per cent in the rate of interest, it would mean a saving of from $100,000,000 to $150,000,000 annually. But the object of rural credit is not merely a reduction of interest charge or to lessen the indebtedness of our farmers. Indeed, rural credit contemplates an enlargement of the use of credit as an instrument for the expansion of agriculture, the enlargement of farming operations, and an increased productivity of the soil.

EXAMPLE OF OTHER NATIONS.

We may profit by the example and experience of the three leading European countries—England, Germany, and France. Germany has an area of less than the State of Texas. Her soil is comparatively poor, and her climate is not as good as that of the United States. She has a population of 66,000,000, but now imports but 5 per cent of her food products. Her population is growing at the rate of a million a year. But Germany is planning to feed her own people—to increase the production of her food products in proportion to the growth in her population. Her statesmen are not planning to reduce the cost of food products by importations from abroad. By tariff duties she protects her farmers from foreign competition. By legislation and by governmental supervision and direction her farmers have been organized for business purposes to secur for them the largest possible percentage of the wealth they produce. She has provided her farmers with ample credit at a low rate of interest. Ample credit has enabled German farmers to enlarge their farming operations German agriculture has been expanding at a ratio corresponding to the growth in population.

France is said to be the banker nation of Europe. Agriculture is her main source of wealth. France, like Germany, protects her farmers by a tariff upon farm products. The markets of France are not opened by a free-trade policy to the agricultural products of the world. The peasant farmers have their agricultural syndicates and their cooperative business organizations, through which they purchase supplies at the lowest prices and sell their products at the highest figures. Agriculture in France has been successfully financed. The Government has aided by grants and subsidies. When the law was passed providing for cooperative banks to provide personal credit for the peasant farmers of France, the Government required the Bank of France to advance 40,000,000 francs to the capital of these banks, and to make large annual advancements thereafter. The Bank of France discounts the notes and bills of the peasant farmers, thus giving the farmers of France access to the greatest money market of the world. Spain, Italy, Belgium, Denmark, Switzerland, Austria-Hungary, and practically all other European countries protect their farmers from foreign competition.

Contrast agricultural conditions in Germany and France with agriculture in England. England's policy has been to rely for political strength upon industrial development at home and the expansion of her commerce abroad. Free trade has been her motto. Agriculture was left to its fate. The result is, England looks to other countries to feed her people. She has done little to organize her farmers for business purposes and has made only slight progress in providing credit for her farmers. It is true that in recent years some splendid men have taken a deep interest in the work of bettering agricultural conditions in that country. Considerable progress has been made in Ireland under the leadership of Sir Horace Plunkett. But England is the one European Government that has done little to aid the development of her agricultural interests. Indeed, her economical policy has obstructed the growth of agriculture, depreciated the value of her farm lands, and impoverished her farmers. England has 800,000 paupers. The United States, with double her population, has less than 80,000. James J. Hill in his book, "Highways of Progress," speaking of the effect of England's policy toward agriculture, says:

Business in the streets of her cities is impeded by processions of gaunt men shouting in wretched concert, "We want work! We want work!"

WHO SHOULD UNITED STATES FOLLOW?

The way is plain for this great Republic. Germany and France and other European nations have marked the way. England's policy and the sad fate of her agriculture stand as a warning to our statesmen and a great object lesson to our farmers. We must abandon the idea of reducing the cost of living by importing food products. We must produce the food to feed our own people. We must give up the policy of free trade in farm products embodied in our new tariff law. We must protect our farmers in our home markets. We must teach our farmers the importance of organization to meet modern conditions in business with a view to reducing to a minimum the cost in the transportation, manufacture, sale, and distribution of farm products. The farmers must have a larger percentage of the wealth they produce and the middlemen must take less.

We must establish a system of agricultural credit for the farmers of the United States that is unexcelled. We must see to it that our farmers can borrow money at as low a rate as it can be borrowed by railway, public utility, and municipal corporations. The farmers must be able to finance their industry as easily and cheaply as any other business is financed. To accomplish this great end the Federal Government and the State governments must enact the necessary legislation and furnish such capital and credit as may be necessary, whether that be much or little. All should be done upon a safe, sound, and conservative basis, but not timidly, grudgingly, or sparingly. Our farmers are the most intelligent on earth. They are loyal and patriotic. They will not be unreasonable in their demands. It is not simply what the farmers of this generation have at stake, but it is the destiny of the Nation that should inspire us to action. We must stay by old-time policy and plan to feed and clothe our own people. We have 3,000,000 square miles of territory. We have 1,900,000,000 acres of land. We have 978,000,000 acres of land included in our farms. Only 478,000,000 acres of this land is improved. Nearly three-fourths of our land is unimproved, unoccupied, uncultivated, and unproductive.

What a magnificent field for agricultural development and expansion! Are we equal to the task before us? To achieve great things we must plan for great things. The destiny of the Nation is in our hands. Fifty years from now we will probably have 200,000,000 people. These millions must be employed—they must be fed and clothed and sheltered. They must live upon a scale that means a high standard of civilization. Means for the promotion of education, culture, refinement, and morality must be provided. We must not forget that agriculture is the base of our industrial pyramid. Our industrial development must be symmetrical. We must maintain the proper equilibrium between our chief industries—commerce, manufacturing, and agriculture. To this end the United States must adopt and pursue an affirmative policy for the promotion of agriculture. We must continue our work in the diffusion of knowledge in scientific agriculture among our farmers; we must guard the markets of our farmers from foreign competition as carefully as we would guard their money; we must aid our farmers in forming business organizations that will enable them to retain a larger per cent of the wealth they produce, and equip them to cope successfully with organized commercial and business interests; and above all we must create a system of farm credits broad enough to include both mortgage and personal credit, long-time and short-time credit, comprehensive enough to meet the wants of the man who owns a farm and the tenant who is ambitious to own a farm; and further yet, we must work out a system of long-time mortgage credit—extending from 25 to 50 years—whereby the farm laborer or the wage earner in the towns and cities with limited means may become the owner of a farm.

The task before us may be difficult, but great will be the reward. For with these things in progress of accomplishment the larger current of population will again flow back to the farm; rural population will increase in equal ratio with our urban population; ample food will be produced to feed our people for an indefinite period; the pillars of the Republic will be strengthened; the American people will maintain their leadership among the Nations of the earth; social standards will be improved; a higher civilization will be developed; poverty will grow less; wealth will be more abundant and more equitably distributed; and a better, brighter, happier day will dawn upon all who shelter under the Stars and Stripes. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN].

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that my colleague [Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington] has left the Chamber, for there is a matter I deem it necessary for me to refer to in which he is an interested party. Whatever bitterness may develop here on this floor between my colleague [Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington] and others, I am quite sure that none shall develop between him and me. I have planned to keep out of the debates or proceedings of this House any reference to the campaign between us as to the representation of the first congressional district on this floor. That is a matter for the hustings in my State. But in my colleague's brief reply to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] awhile ago he threw down the glove before me, in a sense, by criticizing my vote on the tariff. I do not know whether he publishes his speech in to-day's RECORD or not. That glove I shall cheerfully take up at the proper time and place, which is during the campaign and in my district. "The proof of the pudding is in the eating thereof," and I have decided to put the matter up to him in the following manner:

My colleague [Mr. HUMPHREY] having in public debate this afternoon in this House referred to and adversely criticized my vote on the tariff, I invite the gentleman to meet me, and as many of the people of the first congressional district of the State of Washington as care to attend, at a public meeting at the Dreamland Rink, at Seattle, Wash., a hall with a seating capacity of 5,000 people, on such date in the month of September next and under such rules as may be agreed upon by Mr. J. C. Herbsman, the State chairman of the Progressive Party, on my behalf, and some other person to be named by my colleague on his behalf; provided, that the rules to be adopted shall make it in order for Mr. HUMPHREY to defend his own record on the tariff and other matters in Congress and to attack mine, and for me to defend my record and attack his; and provided further, that at the close of the last speech, without further delay, the question of who pays the expenses of the meeting, not to exceed $250, shall be submitted to the audience and decided by majority vote; the amount of such expenses to be deposited pending the decision of the audience by each of the speakers while the band plays but before the speaking begins.

R. S. V. P.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRYAN. Certainly.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to the fact that this appears to be a plan to break the quorum of this House along about the middle of September, and I do not know that it should go unchallenged.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman understand that R. S. V. P. proposition advanced by the gentleman from Washington means that the Members of Congress are invited to this joint debate arranged for in this ex parte matter?

Mr. SLOAN. I have no doubt that the Members of the House will desire to be present at it.

Mr. BRYAN. The debate will doubtless be fixed at a time after adjournment.

Mr. MOORE. Who will bear the expenses of Members of Congress?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi). The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CONNOLLY].

[Mr. CONNOLLY of Iowa addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

To pay the cost of the transportation of diplomatic and consular officers in going to and returning from their posts or when traveling under orders of the Secretary of State at the rate of 5 cents per mile, but not including any expenses incurred in connection with leaves of absence, $25,000.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, it is my desire at this time to present, in my humble way, the condition of market prices of farm products during nine months under the present Democratic tariff. I shall not, however, attempt to do so from a partisan standpoint, but from the standpoint of one who is interested only in facts. I know the great importance of the farming industry to our country.

The tillers of the soil far exceed in numbers those employed in any other single industry. In intelligence, industry, and patriotism they are not excelled by any class. No wealth comes to them excepting by virtue of the sweat of their brows; no discriminations, no trusts, no combinations, and no monopolies are attributable to them. They constitute the great body of law-abiding, industrious, thrifty, and progressive citizens of the Nation. Their prosperity means the Nation's prosperity; their adversity means business depression in the Nation; their importance and intelligence demand that their interests and welfare shall at all times command the serious respect and consideration of all legislators. They are entitled at all times from their Representatives in Congress, regardless of party, to a fair, impartial, and truthful treatment and consideration. A Representative who would knowingly misrepresent the effect of laws and conditions upon their labors and the fruits of their toil would be unworthy of a seat in this legislative body.

The farmers of this country constitute, on the average, the most intelligent body of our citizens. Calamity howlers and blind partisans may for a time deceive a few of them with crocodile tears and prophecies founded in ignorance and partisanship desire, but sooner or later the farmer will realize the truth, and he will welcome the truthteller and cast the calamity howler behind him.

COMPARISON OF LAST AND PRESENT TARIFF RATES.

From our memories figures and percentages are often fleeting. No matter how frequently we may hear or read them, still they will escape from us. It is not usually safe to quote tariff rates or figures without having the same in back and white before our eyes. Knowing that this difficulty is experienced by most men, and in order that the statements that I shall make and the conclusions that I shall endeavor to draw in the course of these remarks, I shall take the liberty at this time of presenting certain tariff-rate tables and tables of market prices.

I do this in order that there may be in these remarks no uncertainty, no guesses, and no prophecies, but a plain straightforward statement of facts. I shall ask my hearers and readers to judge and weigh the present tariff on farm products by its effects on the same, and in the light of the statements and figures I herewith present.

For the purpose of fully understanding these comparisons, let us bear in mind in the beginning that the present Underwood or Democratic tariff became a law on the 3d of October, 1913. The Republican or Payne tariff, immediately preceding it, became a law on the 5th of August, 1909, and continued until its repeal by enactment of the Democratic tariff. Previous to the adoption of the Payne or Republican tariff there was upon the statute books of the United States, a tariff known as the Dingley law, passed some time in 1897.

	Last or Republican tariff law placed on—	Present or Democratic tariff law places on—
Barley	30 cents per bushel	15 cents per bushel.
Corn	15 cents per bushel	Free.
Oats	do	6 cents per bushel.
Rye	10 cents per bushel	Free.
Butter	6 cents per pound	2½ cents per pound.
Cheese	do	20 per cent.
Milk, fresh	2 cents per gallon	Free.
Peas, contained in tin cans	2½ cents per pound	1 cent per pound.
Eggs	5 cents per dozen	Free.
Hay	$4 per ton	$2 per ton.
Potatoes	25 cents per bushel	10 per cent.
Wheat	do	10 cents.
Poultry, alive	3 cents per pound	1 cent per pound.
Poultry, dressed	5 cents per pound	2 cents per pound.
Hogs	$1.50 per head	Free.
Cattle	27½ per cent	Do.
Sheep	$1.50 per head	Do.
Hides	Free	Do.
Wool	11 cents per pound	Do.
Malt	45 cents per bushel	25 cents per bushel.

In the present Underwood or Democratic tariff law, wheat and potatoes are placed upon the free list, excepting importations of wheat and potatoes from countries which maintain a tariff on such articles shipped from the United States to such countries. The present law requires that on wheat and potatoes imported from such countries there be paid a duty of 10 cents a bushel on wheat and 10 per cent ad valorem on potatoes. In these two articles Canada has been and is our principal competitor. Although we have had up to this date nine months of the Underwood tariff law, yet Canada, up to this time, has not placed her wheat or potatoes on her free list. In fact, some two or three months ago a proposition to place these two articles upon the free list so as to take advantage of our present tariff law was defeated decisively in the Canadian Parliament. Indications now are that Canada will maintain a duty against wheat and potatoes imported into that country, and so long as she does, a tariff duty will be maintained in this country against Canadian wheat and potatoes to the extent of 10 cents per bushel on wheat and 10 per cent ad valorem on potatoes.

THE TARIFF ON DAIRY PRODUCTS.

There are no products of the farmer more sensitive to competition than are dairy products. If the Underwood or new Democratic tariff has worked an injury to the farmer, or lowered the prices which he receives for his products, it will show that injury first in those products which are the most sensitive to competition. Our Republican friends upon the floor of this House have charged repeatedly that the new Democratic tariff is ruining and destroying the prosperity of the farmer. They have pointed out instances of the importation of a few thousand bushels of corn from Argentina, a few thousand pounds of beef from the same country, and a few thousand tubs of butter from Argentina, New Zealand, Siberia, Denmark, and Australia. Import statistics prove that it is true that butter has been imported during the last nine months from the countries named, as well as some corn and beef.

During the debate upon that schedule of the tariff bill relating to farm products it was freely predicted by our opponents that so many farm products were being placed upon the free list and the duty upon so many other farm products materially reduced that the farmer could not help being ruined and forced into bankruptcy. In fact, I was one of those who sincerely believed that the new tariff bill cut too deep into the tariff on some farm products and placed too many of the same on the free list. I was one of those who in the Democratic caucus actually and vigorously protested against the reduction of the tariff duty on dairy products, on barley, oats, wheat, cattle, and beef. At that time I honestly believed that too great a reduction was being made in the tariff on farm products as compared with those of other industries. I had the courage to say so then; but having since discovered and learned by observation that the tariff has had no such effect upon farm products, nor any injurious effect at all, I have the courage to acknowledge my mistake and belief, and shall endeavor to cite the proof of those facts to you now.

If the lowering of the tariff on dairy products has worked an injury to the farmer and producer of those products, I believe that that injury would have been first seen and demonstrated in the greatest of all dairy States, the State of Wisconsin, which I have the honor to in part represent. It is the greatest dairy producing State in the Union, and I have the honor of representing the most extensive and productive dairy producing congressional district in the United States.

According to the census returns of 1909, Wisconsin is the champion dairy producing State in the Union, and since that date its dairy products have increased in a large degree. By that census it had displaced New York, which was second in dairy importance, while Iowa was third in rank and Minnesota fourth. The bureau's figures upon the production of butter, cheese, and condensed milk, according to that census, are as follows:

	Number of establishments.	Amount.
Wisconsin	3,040	$53,843,249
New York	1,552	42,458,345
Iowa	512	26,849,863
Minnesota	784	25,297,462
Illinois	295	17,798,278
Michigan	435	14,287,496
Indiana	132	3,958,600

According to the Wisconsin Dairy and Food Commission, Wisconsin in the year 1912 manufactured 47 to 50 per cent of the Nation's cheese supply. Our cheese men were making no less than 35 types of cheese in that year, and they were making the styles and types for which there was the greatest demand upon the leading cheese markets of the country. In that year the value of cheese products in Wisconsin was between $23,000,000 and $24,000,000. The estimated production of cheese in Wisconsin for 1912 was 180,000,000 pounds, and since that time the production of that article in Wisconsin has been largely increased.

I cite these facts for the purpose of showing you a dairy market that would most certainly show the bad effects of the rates upon farm products in the Underwood tariff bill, if it has a depressing or cheapening effect upon such farm products any where in the country. If the farmers of that State have not suffered in the price which they received for their dairy products since the Underwood tariff law has been in effect, then the prices received by the farmers for such products have not been cheapened in any other portion of the country.

CHEESE MARKET.

At Plymouth and at Sheboygan, in Sheboygan County, in my district, are to be found the largest primary cheese markets in the country. The cheese markets of these little cities have for years had, and still have, a national reputation. Upon reliable authority I have been supplied with the prices paid to the cheese makers upon three distinct and separate dates in each of the years 1913 and 1914:

Cheese prices on Plymouth Central Cheese Board, 1913 and 1914.

	Feb. 18, 1913.	Feb. 17, 1914.	Apr. 29, 1913.	Apr. 28, 1914.	June 17, 1913.	June 16, 1914.
Longhorns	17½	17½	13⅞	16	14¾	15½
Young Americas	16¾	17⅜	13½	15½	14⅜	15½
Daisies	17¼	17	14¼	16½	14½	14½
Twins	16	16½	13½	15⅜	14½	14⅜
Square prints	16½	17⅜	14¼	16⅜	15	15½

A bare inspection of the above table discloses the fact that the price for each variety of cheese above named on the three different dates in the year 1914 above stated were higher than the same variety of cheese on or about the same dates in the year 1913, and they may be verified by an inspection of the records of the Plymouth cheese boards.

It may, however, be contended by some that the Plymouth and Sheboygan cheese markets are but local in their nature and do not reflect the true market value of cheese throughout the country. In other words, some people have contended that the price of New York cheese has been reduced below the price that was received for it by the cheese maker last year. Owing to the added competition from Canada, because of the lowering of the tariff on cheese, there have been charges and countercharges in relation to the price of Wisconsin and New York cheese. In order to give the facts, I herewith produce market prices back for a period of nine years, so that those who care to may judge for themselves. This year the New York prices of cheese, which are most exposed to Canadian and foreign competition, lead over the prices paid for cheese in Wisconsin, but in former years Sheboygan County board prices were higher than other dairy boards in the United States and Canada. Figures are the best evidence, and these can be verified as to their correctness. The prices were as follows:

Months.	Plymouth board.	Utica, N.Y., board.	Canada.
	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.
June, 1914	[1] 14⅞	[1] 14⅜	.....
June, 1913	14	13⅜	.....
June, 1912	12¼	12⅜	14
June, 1911	11⅞	10⅜	10⅜
June, 1910	15	13½	10¼
June, 1909	13⅜	12⅜	13⅜
June, 1908	10⅜	10	11
June, 1907	13	11⅞	12¼
June, 1906	11⅜	10⅜	12
June, 1905	10	8½	9⅜

[1] Flats.

In this connection I take the liberty of presenting cheese-market reports from the June 24, 1914, issue of the Dairy Market Reporter, the official organ of the Wisconsin Cheesemakers' Association, published at Sheboygan Falls, Wis. This shows the price paid for the different grades of cheese upon the Sheboygan Dairy Board and upon the Plymouth Central Cheese Board on practically the same day of the same month in the years 1913 and 1914. The prices here shown are also substantially the prices paid for cheese at Plymouth, Wis., by the Sheboygan County Cheese Cooperative Society, a rival cheese board. The prices paid for the different grades by all boards in June this year are higher than the prices paid for the same grades of cheese at the same time in the year 1913. I also add cheese-market prices paid at Brockville, a noted cheese-marketing center in Canada, on the 18th of this last June, for the purpose of affording a comparison between American and Canadian cheese prices:

SHEBOYGAN DAIRY BOARD.

SHEBOYGAN, WIS., June 23, 1914.

Twenty-three factories offered 2,383 boxes of cheese on the call board to-day, and all sold as follows: 332 cases Young Americas, at 15 cents; 70 cases longhorns, at 15⅜ cents; 1,861, at 15¼ cents; and 120 boxes square prints, at 15½ cents.

Sales a year ago to-day on the Sheboygan board were—142 cases Young Americas, at 14⅜ cents; 616, at 14¼ cents; 537 cases longhorns, at 14⅜ cents; 1,638, at 14½ cents; and 120 boxes square prints, at 14⅝ cents.

PLYMOUTH CENTRAL CHEESE BOARD.

Twenty-four factories offered 2,581 boxes of cheese on the call board to-day, and all sold as follows: 69 twins, at 14½ cents; 336 cases Young Americas, at 15 cents; 445 daisies, at 14½ cents; 30 double daisies, at 14¼ cents; 1,234 cases longhorns, at 15¼ cents; 115 boxes square prints, at 15⅜ cents, 252 at 15¼ cents, and 100 at 15 cents.

Sales a year ago to-day on the Plymouth board were: One hundred and twenty-three twins at 14 cents, 447 cases Young Americas at 14½ cents, 122 daisies at 15⅜ cents, 1,778 at 14¼ cents, 12 double daisies at 14 cents, 63 cases longhorns at 14⅜ cents, 1,443 at 14½ cents, and 260 boxes square prints at 14⅞ cents.

CANADIAN CHEESE MARKETS.

[From the Montreal Trade Bulletin.]

BROCKVILLE, June 18.

About 8,000 boxes of cheese changed hands here to-day at a ruling of 12⅝ cents, although 12⅛ cents and 12⅞ cents, the latter price for white, was paid in some quarters. The ruling is a quarter of a cent lower than a week ago. At the board meeting there were no sales, the salesmen refusing to accept the reduced offer. The goods put up for sale totaled 2,880 boxes of colored and 1,000 boxes of white.

BUTTER.

Wisconsin is one of the largest butter-producing States in the Union, its butter products in 1910 amounting in value, in round numbers, to $80,000,000, and it is reliably estimated that its annual production has since increased in value to over $100,000,000. Any tariff detrimental to the butter interests of the country would be reflected in the prices paid for butter in the markets of Wisconsin, but no evidences of such reduction are to be found in the market prices paid to the farmers of that State this year under the Underwood tariff law as compared with the prices paid the creamery men or butter makers under the Payne tariff law.

I herewith submit a table showing the prices paid for creamery butter on different dates in the months of January, February, March, April, May, and June in the years 1911, 1913, and 1914 at Johnson Creek, in my district, one of the largest creamery butter producing points in the Northwest:

It will be observed that the prices paid for butter in given months in 1911 and 1914 were in every instance higher in 1914 than in 1911, and that the prices paid on the same dates and months in 1913 vary. In some instances the prices of 1914 were from one-half to 2 and 3 cents lower than on the same or corresponding dates in 1913, but in a majority of cases they were higher in 1914 than in 1913.

ELGIN BUTTER MARKET.

The butter market of Elgin, Ill., is widely known as an important, extensive, central, and controlling butter market. It usually correctly reflects the price of butter throughout the season. Its butter quotations are now and for a number of years last past have been largely in general use in the markets of the Northwest. For the purpose of affording a comparison of this year's prices and those of previous years and for the additional purpose of showing that the local market reports which I have quoted are correct, I present the following report from the Elgin market, proving conclusively that upon that important butter market, the price of butter in the month of June this year was as high as it had been at the same time in that market in the four years next preceding this:

ELGIN BUTTER MARKET.

Sales on the call board were at the same price as last week, 27½ cents. Six lots were offered. They amounted to 126 tubs; all sold at 27½ cents. Bids ranged 26, 26½, 26¾, 27½ cents. Elgin price for week, based on majority sales, was 27½ cents.

BUTTER COMPETITION.

Many intelligent and industrious dairymen interested in producing butter have expressed the fear that competition with imported butter would result in lowering the prices of butter. This is a mighty important question to all farmers. It is true that some butter has been imported. I wish, however, at this time to take the liberty of quoting the opinion of that experienced and responsible dairyman, ex-Gov. W. D. Hoard, of Fort Atkinson, Wis. This gentleman has had a long experience in all dairy matters. He is not one of those who would be likely to go out of his way to say a good word for the butter tariff contained in the present Democratic tariff law. He is an able, intelligent, and patriotic gentleman, and one whose Republicanism never has been and is not now being questioned. He is and for a long time has been the editor and publisher of Hoard's Dairyman, the leading dairy paper published in the United States, and recognized as an authority.

FOREIGN BUTTER.

In an editorial in Hoard's Dairyman, published at Fort Atkinson, in my district, on the 19th of last February, the following opinion was expressed by the editor or the editorial force of that paper:

Since the passage of the Underwood-Wilson tariff and the consequent reduction of the protective duty on butter, many of our readers have expressed great fear that the butter industry of this country would be greatly injured thereby. No doubt can be had whatever that between the upper and lower millstones—the tariff and oleomargarine—the common and inferior makes of butter are going to suffer somewhat. But, as we view the situation, the injury will be visited almost wholly upon the lower grades, and for this reason fine high-grade butter has never been a drug upon the market. Indeed there has never been enough of it to supply the demand at a fair price. This quality of butter is almost wholly dependent upon flavor. The number of people who want good butter is constantly increasing. Foreign butters and oleomargarine do not reach that demand. No creamery that can persuade its farmers to supply it with high-grade milk and cream need fear any serious injury to its trade. It is only those who market an inferior grade of butter that are going to be most affected by the foreign importations.

From another editorial published in the same paper a few weeks later the following extract is taken:

Well, times are changed. The public is getting its fill of bad butter. Last year witnessed for the first time a real spread in price between good and bad butter. The markets have begun to react. There came on a little change in the tariff. It was dropped from 6 cents to 2½ cents per pound. Foreign butter from Australia, New Zealand, Denmark, and Russia began to make its appearance in American markets. That, together with a heavy production at home, sent prices down. The decline has apparently stopped at a point where it is not profitable to bring in the high-grade Danish and New Zealand butter, but the low-grade Russian and Australian butters are selling several cents lower on English markets, and can still come in and compete with American low-grade goods. What is the result? There is going on all over the country a strenuous effort to get good cream to make the high-grade butter that will not come into competition with the low-grade foreign stuff, and it looks as though there would be no creamery, big or little, that can not make good. The little change in the butter schedule may mean the salvation of the butter industry in the country.

In an article published in a later edition of Hoard's Dairyman, written by Prof. G. L. McKay, an agricultural expert of the University of Illinois, we find the following language:

The lowering of the tariff has resulted in the importation of some foreign butter, as would naturally be expected. This at first caused some uneasiness among dealers who could not see the extent to which foreign butter would be imported in the future. This is responsible for the recent fluctuations in the price of butter.

Farmers and everybody else should remember that there is still a tax of 2½ cents per pound on butter. Adding to this the railway and steamship charges for transportation we find that the American producer has still a protection of about 3½ cents per pound. This should be sufficient to offset the cost of labor in foreign countries. In Europe women and children perform a great deal of the outside labor, which reduces the cost of production considerably in those countries.

Even if another political party comes into power soon it is doubtful if we will ever again have a much higher duty than now on dairy products. We certainly can not expect to have a duty of 6 cents per pound on butter, as we have had up to the present time.

A certain amount of competition is a good thing. It stimulates. The dairyman is much like a man on a bicycle. He can not stand still. He has either got to go forward or fall over. I believe he will go forward.

The countries from which we may expect competition are New Zealand, Australia, Argentine Republic, and Siberia. While some butter has been imported from Denmark, I do not look for much butter from that country. The Danish people already have established a trade with Great Britain. The Englishmen are very fond of good things to eat, and they are one of the greatest consumers of butter in the world. They demand a very fine grade of butter and are willing to pay for it. This Denmark is at present supplying to them. There seems to be no reason to expect the Danish will give up this profitable market to send all their butter to this country.

It may be safely stated that the importation of foreign butter into this country will not affect our best grade of butter, as this will be superior to the butter sent from the other countries I have mentioned. On the whole, I am inclined to believe that the little competition we will get will stimulate our people so that we will produce more butter and better butter in the future than we have ever done in the past. We need not expect to be swamped by any great invasion of foreign butter. Only a certain amount of butter is produced in the world, and a certain amount of this is required for home consumption. If all the butter made should be sent to the United States, there would be a butter famine in every country, which would have serious results. Hence, I can not see anything alarming in the dairy situation at the present time.

Up to date there have arrived in New York 1,481,522 pounds of butter; 4,179 casks came from London, 52 from Liverpool, 150 from Hull, 12 from Havre, 2,090 from Copenhagen, 419 from Hamburg, 5 from Rotterdam, 13 from Trieste, and 10 from Palermo; also 8,967 boxes from London, 6 boxes from Liverpool, and 2,014 boxes from Buenos Aires, making a total importation of 6,930 casks and 10,980 boxes. The casks average 125 pounds and the boxes 56 pounds, which makes the total 1,481,522 pounds. It is also interesting to note that of the imports thus far 5,837 casks were Siberian butter, mostly last summer's make and of low grade; 7,967 boxes were cold storage, Australian butter bought on the London market, 1,004 fresh New Zealand, 1,085 casks of fresh Danish, 2,014 boxes fresh Argentine, and 23 packages from southern Europe.

The Danish butter costs 31½ cents delivered in New York. So there is no money in the importation of butter of this quality.

Last June 336 pounds of butter were brought into this country through San Francisco, 229 pounds in July, and 506 pounds in August. These, of course, were sample lots of butter. In October, 104,200 pounds were imported; in November, 345,840; in December, 281,084, and in January, 749,454 pounds. This butter costs from 29 to 30½ cents per pound. The great bulk of this butter came from New Zealand when our market broke. Everyone who imported this butter has lost money on it, not only because of the drop in the prices, but because some of the New Zealand butter, which was stored when the prices went down, turned fishy. As a result dealers who had contracted for further shipments sent them on to England, preferring to take their losses over there rather than keep it in this country.

Our experience so far with foreign butter suggests that the lowering of the tariff may have the same effect as opening up gates that have shut out water from a low place. The water rushes in with a tremendous velocity that looks for a while as if it would sweep everything before it; but soon the turmoil subsides and the water falls back and finds its own level.

Most of the foreign countries were very anxious to test our markets. They have tested them, and so far without much success. I expect to see conditions readjust themselves very soon.

Our greatest need in America to-day is more cooperation among the agricultural interests and greater study and attention to general agricultural problems. We are blessed in this country with excellent soil and climatic conditions. Our soil in the Central West is adapted to the growth of all forage plants. We do not have to use fertilizers as they do in Europe. Hence, we can produce food of all kinds more cheaply than they can if we apply the same amount of skill and attention. The European farmer has to give strict attention to farming in order to make a livelihood, as their soil is not as productive as ours. He must make the very best use of his materials, and he does.

In closing I repeat that I do not see anything alarming in the dairy situation. The little competition which we will have will prove a healthy stimulus to our farmers. It may seem hard for a while, but I believe it will work out all right in the end.

These sentiments relating to butter prices are corroborated and indorsed in an article published February 18, 1914, in the West Bend Pilot, in my district, written by Mr. Carl H. Wallau, an extensive owner and operator of creameries in Washington County, Wis. He entertains and expresses views identical with those contained in Hoard's Dairyman. His article is quite lengthy, but there is nothing in it to indicate that it is from Hoard's Dairyman, but appears to be an independent thought of Mr. Wallau This gentleman is not only a leading creameryman but is an intelligent and industrious citizen, and in politics a Republican. He says in his article as follows:

MR. EDITOR: On the front page of your issue of February 11, 1914, appears an article headed "Indicates cheaper butter," reprinted from the Milwaukee Daily News. In connection with this article permit me to say that the highest grade of creamery butter has little to fear from the importations of foreign butter, as of the high grade known as "Extra creamery" not enough is produced to supply the demand, and the quality of butter imported thus far ranks only with a fair grade of storage butter. Therefore it will come into competition with such or second-grade butter, with the effect that the poor butter maker and the creamery man who is careless about his work either will have to mend their ways or quit the business, as they are the ones who will suffer mainly from this new competition.

That the importation will have some influence on the price of first-grade butter during the flush of storage seasons can not be denied, but all butter factories are now equipped to change from butter to cheese making at a moment's notice, and therefore can take advantage always of the highest market.

In conclusion we wish to say that the man who has won the confidence of his patrons and continues his business in a straight and businesslike manner, aiming to produce the best butter that can be produced, and spares no expense to keep the quality of his butter at a uniform high standard, has nothing to fear from such competition, from the importation of Australian butter, or the organization of a few more creameries.

It is true that since March 15, 1914, the price of butter has fallen in some instances 4 or 5 cents. Of course, those who believe that all good things spring from a Republican tariff, charge this decrease in price of butter since that period to a Democratic tariff. In the last three or four weeks it has, however, regained, and even exceeds, last year's butter prices at this date.

The facts, however, are quite plain, and show positively that whatever decrease there has been in the price of butter since March 15 is due not to the tariff but to supply and demand. The butter on hand in public and private storages on March 1, 1914, as compared with other recent years on the same date is interesting. For this purpose, I again quote liberally from an editorial article from Hoard's Dairyman, of March 4, 1913, which is self-explanatory. It shows that on the 1st of March, this year, there was in stock in the four principal butter markets of the country more butter than at any time on that date during the years 1912 and 1913. This table shows that there was on hand on the 1st of March, 1911, in round numbers, over 30,000,000 pounds of butter in such four markets, as against 18,000,000 this last March 1, 9,681,000 in 1913, and 11,720,000 in 1912. It shows plainly and positively that in the years when the largest stock of butter was on hand on that date the price was lowest; and, on the other hand, it shows that in those years when the stock was lowest, to wit, March, 1913, when only 9,681,000 pounds were on hand, the price was the highest.

The second of the tables herewith submitted shows the London butter-market prices for different periods in 1911, 1912, and 1913 as compared with the price of butter on the market in New York, and that in nearly every instance if there were added to the London market price of Australian, New Zealand, Danish, and Siberian butter the 2½ cents per pound present tariff and a cent for transportation charges that there were only a few instances in the whole column of figures where the London price plus the 3½ cents revenue and transportation charges does not exceed the New York butter-market price. Such being the case, it is silly to contend that foreign butter dealers will sell their butter in New York at a price which will bring them less net per pound than in London. These tables were not composed by Mr. Urner to advance any partisan interests, but were submitted from the standpoint of a business man, without reference to any political bearing that they might have. I trust that all interested in what butter is and will be worth will read these tables and his language carefully.

The butter on hand in public and private storage on March 1, 1914, as compared with other years is interesting.

The following table gives the stocks on hand March 1 in the four principal markets—New York, Chicago, Boston, and Philadelphia—and the average prices on the Elgin markets for February and subsequent dates for the same years:

	1911	1912	1913	1914
Pounds of butter, Mar. 1	30,148,800	11,723,400	9,681,000	18,268,000

June (1st Monday)	21.50	25	28.5	.....
July (1st Monday)	23	25.50	26.5	.....

The above figures would seem to indicate that the stocks on hand March 1 each year were sufficient to warrant the change in price. It will be noted that the February price of 29.4 cents in 1914 is almost equal to the February price of 29.75 cents for 1912, and there was in storage 6,574,600 pounds more butter than in 1912.

The total imports from the time that the new tariff went into effect until March 1, 1914, were less than 6,000,000 pounds.

Mr. Frank G. Urner, of New York Produce Review, in an address before the Michigan Poultry, Butter, and Egg Association, gave some very interesting figures in American and foreign prices of butter. The following table was prepared by him from English sources. The table gives the prices of foreign butter in the London market, the great world's market for the surplus of all nations.

"One of the striking things about this table is the remarkably uniform prices of butter throughout the year on the London market, while the American prices vary as much as 13.2 cents between July, 1911, and January, 1912, and 10.2 cents between August, 1912, and March, 1913.

"Probably one of the effects of the new tariff will be to level the prices in this country and lower them somewhere near to the London market plus the extra freight charges, if any, and the 2½ cents tariff. Mr. Urner estimates that the reduction in American prices, in order that foreign butter of the best grades may be marketed in competition with our butter, will be in the case of Danish butter from zero to 1 cent, in the case of New Zealand butter 1 cent, about 2 cents in Australian, and about 3 cents in Siberian. In the case of undergrades the reduction of American undergrades which would compete would be greater than the above figures.

"There has been received in New York between the time the new tariff went into effect until February 10, 1914, 6,930 casks and 10,987 boxes, or about 1,500,000 pounds, of foreign butter. Most of the Siberian butter was low-grade storage goods. Nearly 8,000 boxes were Australian storage butter from London, and was of low grade.

"Fresh butter from New Zealand, Denmark, and Australia was of very good quality. It would seem that the American creameries making low-grade butter are the ones likely to suffer from foreign competition. It is said that the bulk of the storage stocks now held in New York are of low-grade goods.

"Creamery men and patrons had better take a good, long, hard think about this quality question."

DEMOCRATIC PROTECTION OF BUTTER.

Far more important than any tariff that may be imposed upon butter imports is the protection of the American farmer butter maker and creamery man from the fraudulent competition of oleomargarine and other substitutes for butter. For years this sort of competition has been going on, notwithstanding a statute sufficient, if enforced, to protect the American farmer. Great losses have been sustained by the American farmer through want of the enforcement of this law. Those Republican partisans who are now singing in chorus the calamity howl, for 16 years sat idly by winking at the fierce competition to which the American butter makers were forced by the Beef and Oleomargarine Trusts, and never once did they raise their hand to protect the American butter maker against this sort of competition.

Since the Department of Justice has been in charge of a Democratic administration the American farmer has witnessed the doing of things for his protection against those who would compete with him by fraud and deception.

Take the case of John F. Jelke, the millionaire oleomargarine manufacturer, convicted on the 4th day of last May in the United States district court at Chicago, and sentenced by Judge F. A. Geiger to serve two years in the Federal penitentiary at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., and fined $10,000, for conspiring to defraud the United States Government of taxes on oleomargarine, the sentence imposed upon him being the maximum under the law.

Nine of the associates and employees of this oleomargarine manufacturer, Jelke, were fined $2,500 each for conspiring with him in the perpetration of oleomargarine frauds.

It is true that Jelke was indicted under the Taft administration late in the summer of 1911. After commencing the prosecution of this millionaire manufacturer who had colored white oleomargarine and sold it without paying the Federal tax, Federal suits were started by the Government during the Taft administration in Chicago, to recover $800,000 in oleomargarine tax from this violator of the law. When the case was gone into on preliminary examination, it was found that the oleomargarine manufacturer, the J. F. Jelke Co., owed the Government over $2,000,000 in oleomargarine taxes which they failed to pay the Government, instead of $800,000, which Secretary of the Treasury MacVeagh, a Republican Cabinet Member, had compromised for $101,000. Upon the coming into power of the Wilson administration the proposed compromise with this millionaire violator of the oleomargarine law was set aside.

Commissioner Osborne, the present faithful Democratic Commissioner of Internal Revenue, is pushing the investigation of these cases of violation of the oleomargarine laws for the collection of $2,000,000 that was overlooked by Commissioner Cabell and Secretary MacVeagh, under the Taft administration, and a Democratic Department of Justice has commenced proceedings to recover the same.

The butter interests of the country owe a debt of gratitude to the present Democratic administration in bringing the facts concerning these cases out in the open and showing up the unfaithful officials under the Taft administration who had sworn to perform their duties to the American people, but were caught compromising with the oleomargarine manufacturers who had gonged the Government out of $2,000,000, and were allowing them to be let off criminally and financially with the payment of only $101,000. A sentence of this oleomargarine manufacturer of two years in the United States penitentiary at Fort Leavenworth, and the payment of a fine of $10,000, will go further toward purifying the butter markets of the country of spurious and fraudulent butter competition than all the tariff duties that can be piled upon imported butter.

This is only one conspicuous example of what the present Democratic administration has done in trying to stamp out this fraudulent competition on the part of oleomargarine manufacturers against real butter produced by the genuine farmer. There are many other examples or cases of prosecution started to punish oleomargarine offenders which time and space forbid to specify at this time. Such work is the kind of protection this Democratic administration is giving the real butter makers of the country. If oleomargarine were made to stand upon its own bottom, the genuine butter producers of this country would need have absolutely no fear of foreign competition.

This is one of the few instances in which a millionaire has been sentenced to prison for violating the law. It will have a far more reaching effect in protecting the farmer from such fraudulent competition than a thousand ordinary sentences by fine for such violations, and it will have a most wholesome effect.

There is now pending similar criminal prosecutions against the Moxley Oleomargarine Co., of Chicago, who are slated to be tried on a similar charge next September. For years the farmers have been complaining of the looseness and lack of enforcement of the law when violated by oleomargarine manufacturers, but this is the first administration in the history of that law in which violators have been given the stern sentence of imprisonment. This is genuine protection for the farmer.

WOOL.

Whenever there has been a general revision of the tariff the question of protection or free trade for wool has always occupied the center of attention. Those favoring the policy of tariff protection for wool and sheep always predicted the ruination of the wool and sheep industry of this country if they were to be placed upon the free list. On the other hand, the Democratic Party has, as a rule, contended and declared that the free listing of wool would be beneficial not only to the manufacturers of woolen goods, but to the producers of wool.

When the Underwood tariff bill was pending in the House and Senate in the spring of 1913 and down to the present time the champions of protection for wool have filled the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and the press of the country with gloomy and direful predictions of ruination for the sheep and wool industry of the country. Many Democrats in the Democratic House caucus doubted the wisdom of placing wool upon the free list, but the majority of our fellow Democrats were of a different opinion and finally succeeded in writing upon the statute books a tariff placing wool upon the free list. In the course of the debate upon the wool question it was pointed out by friends of the policy of free listing wool, that the policy of protection for wool had failed to encourage and increase the number of sheep raised in this country. The censuses of 1890 and 1900 were called forth to prove and did show conclusively that the number of sheep in this country decreased from 1890 to 1900 by more than 13,000,000. Even then, with a tariff during that period of about 11 cents a pound upon unwashed wool, the price of American-grown wool was not such as to leave the wool producer even a fair profit for his capital and labor.

The last Republican tariff placed a duty of 11 cents a pound on unwashed first-class wool. The present Underwood or Democratic tariff places wool on the free list.

Wisconsin is not known as a wool-producing State, yet, according to the census of 1910, there were upon the farms of that State in that year 929,783 sheep, of which 628,539 were of shearing age. This last number of sheep represented a decrease of 36.3 per cent as compared with the number of sheep of shearing age in Wisconsin on June 1, 1900. The wool produced in that State in 1910 amounted to 4,688,000 pounds, and was valued at $1,267,000. It will thus be noticed that, notwithstanding there was upon imported wool from 1900 to 1910 a tariff of not less than 11 cents a pound, yet the actual number of sheep decreased in that State. Of the total number of sheep of shearing age in the State, 45,048, valued at $89,323, belonged to the second congressional district, which I have the honor of representing. The rank of Wisconsin as a sheep and wool producing State, according to the census of 1913, is fourteenth in the Nation. The second congressional district ranks higher than the average district in Wisconsin in raising sheep and producing wool.

I have, therefore, assumed, in making an investigation and comparison of the prices paid for wool in the second congressional district of Wisconsin for last year and this year that the market prices in that district ought to be fairly representative of the market prices throughout the country. I have written seven different firms of wool jobbers and dealers in my district to ascertain the price of wool at the same dates last year and this, and I have found that the price of unwashed wool in the year 1913, from the 1st to the 20th of June, ranged from 17 to 19½ cents per pound, and that during the period of from the 1st to the 20th of June, 1914, the market price of wool paid to the farmer-producer by the wool jobbers and dealers in the same places, ranged from 21 to 23½ cents per pound. This information comes from first hands and in direct response to letters written to the parties from whom the information was sought without expressing to them the purpose for which it was sought.

I have obtained reliable information from one of the best-known woolen mills in the country, situated at Sheboygan Falls, Wis., that this mill, which buys its supply of wool from farmers producing the same in that vicinity and elsewhere in this country, that the prices paid by them were as follows:

Scoured medium wool, pound	$0.35	$0.44 to $0.42
Do, do	.40	.45 to .46
Do, do	.45	.50 to .52
Scoured fine wool, do	.50	.58 to .60

It thus will be seen that the average price of the lower grades of wool increased in my district, from 1913 to 1914, 4 cents per pound and that the higher grades increased 3½ cents per pound.

The wool produced in Wisconsin, although of a fair grade and quality, is not equal to the highest and best grade of wool produced in the country, such as produced in the State of Ohio. According to the United States Census statistics for 1913, the wool produced in the latter State averages 65 per cent fine and 35 per cent medium, while the Wisconsin wool, according to the same census reports, averages only 20 per cent fine and 80 per cent medium.

I have in my possession a letter dated June 25, 1914, written by the Hon. J. W. Cassingham, of Coshocton, Ohio, to our colleague, Hon. WILLIAM A. ASHBROOK, in which Mr. Cassingham, who was formerly a Member of this House and is now president of the Commercial National Bank of that place, and is a reliable, well-informed, and experienced business man generally, says that fine unwashed merino wool sold in Ohio in 1913 at 20 cents per pound, and that the same grade of wool sold in the same place and State in the year 1914 at 25 cents per pound. I am reliably informed that all first-class unwashed merino wool produced in Ohio is this year selling generally at an advance of 5 cents per pound, excepting such as was contracted for early before the wool market had developed.

Undoubtedly many farmers will be found who will claim that the market price of wool paid to them has not advanced over the price paid in the year 1913, but wherever you find a farmer who makes such a claim you will find one who had contracted early to sell his wool and before the price of wool had been fixed by the supply and demand. Farmers who contracted to sell their wool clip early were induced to do so by the hue and cry of Republican calamity howlers, who by their direful songs and doleful choruses caused a feeling to prevail that wool and sheep were going to the dogs at a two-forty rate. Wool farmers who were thus deceived and lost several cents per pound for their wool clip this season have no one to blame but Republican calamity howlers, who have been filling the ears of the woolgrowers with the predictions of direful ruination. Comparisons in the price of wool for the last 17 years show that wool is bringing a higher price to-day than at any time since 1897, and reliable testimony to this effect is appearing every day in the columns of the public press.

Recently through the courtesy of my colleague of the sixth district of Wisconsin, Hon. M. K. REILLY, I was shown a copy of the Oshkosh Northwestern, a Republican newspaper published at Oshkosh, Wis., under date of June 6, 1914. The editorial policy of that paper is, and always has been, Republican, and it is published by a Republican editor, who in the past has been highly honored by his party and his fellow citizens.

Among other things stated in his editorial upon wool, I find the following paragraph:

> In the wool manufacturing industry, the same as with the woolgrowers, it is now conceded that the tariff instead of proving destructive, is having very little effect upon conditions. The American woolen mills are having all they can do; there has been no reductions in profits or dividends, and with assurances of continued prosperity, there have been several noticeable extensions and enlargements of their business.

A further paragraph from this distinguished editor may be of interest to our standpat Republican friends, who, ever since the Underwood bill was introduced in the House of Representatives, have been howling themselves blue in the face in uttering dire prophecies of failure and ruination for American business and industries. It is as follows:

> The new tariff may not be perfect, it is true; yet a perfect tariff is beyond the range of hope or possibility. It will be noted, however, that few, if any, specific instances are being cited where the new tariff is proving destructive or even seriously damaging to American industries.

It is, indeed, refreshing in these days of perpetual calamity howling to find a Republican newspaper that will treat and discuss the tariff question and the business conditions of the country from a business and not a partisan standpoint. The Oshkosh Northwestern editor and his valuable paper are to be congratulated upon his fairness, sound judgment, and good citizenship.

From nearly all the great wool-producing sections of the far West come reliable reports showing the market price paid wool raisers for their wool clip this year to be from 3 to 5 cents per pound more than last year. In fact, reliable evidence is at hand showing that in many instances wool has sold this year in Oregon and other mountain States at a higher price than has been received for the same in the last 17 years. When we take into consideration that during those 17 years there has been a tariff duty on imported wool of not less than 11 cents a pound, we may be able to appreciate the fact that may be it was not the tariff on wool heretofore nor the fact that it is now on the free list that makes wool higher now. This may open our eyes to the fact and enable us to see that as a general rule the price of farm products are controlled by supply and demand and not to a certainty or to a general rule by a tariff duty on imports. I do not for one moment claim that the advance in the price of wool is solely due to the free listing of imported wool, but it is in part due to that fact and in the remaining part that there is a scarcity of sheep in the country. This last fact is not due to the new tariff, but the decrease in sheep, as shown by the 1899 and 1909 census of Wisconsin, has been more than 36 per cent in the last 10 years, and about 15 per cent decrease in the Nation. The free listing of wool has made it possible for woolen mills to continue and to enlarge their business operations. It is a notorious fact that during the Payne tariff certain woolen mills which were required to use certain grades of foreign wool in order to manufacture the kind of cloth for which they had been equipped and had built up a market or trade were unable to operate and were driven to the wall.

There are in my home city of Beaver Dam, Wis., two instances of this last kind. One woolen mill located there was established in 1863, and the other was built in 1865. The latter continued in business until four years ago last August, when, under the Payne or Republican tariff of 11 cents a pound on wool, it was obliged to shut down and go out of business and has remained out of business since.

The woolen mill established in 1863 continued to do business until two years ago last October, when under a Republican tariff of 11 cents a pound on wool it was forced to close. These two woolen mills were for years the most prosperous to be found in the Northwest. One of these mills now has for over four years and the other for over two years been standing empty and idle, without a loom stirring, all due to a traiff that prevented them from obtaining at a reasonable price imported wools that were necessary to be used in manufacturing their particular kind of cloth, for which they had built up a trade.

For years the National Woolen Manufacturers and Wool Association at their annual meetings have passed resolutions commending a tariff on wool and condemning any and all movements toward the free listing of wool. They met again this year, but no resolution in condemnation of the free listing of wool was passed by this association.

The United States Department of Agriculture arranged last May for a national conference of representatives of woolgrowers and of the wool business to bring out views from all interests as to what the Government might be able to do to assist in increasing the world's supply of wool. There came to this convention woolgrowers, merchants, spinners, and weavers for the purpose of considering their business in all its aspects. That convention was in session several days and not once was the subject of a tariff talked about. There were in this conference over 100 men, representing all phases of the wool and woolen manufacturing business. They discussed the different phases of the wool and woolen business, but they said nothing about the tariff. The reason was that instead of being ruined by the newly reduced and much abused wool tariff rates, the wool business and the woolen manufacturing business has been increasing right along at the head of farm products and manufacturing enterprises.

It was expected by nearly everyone that the price of wool would drop as soon as the Underwood bill became a law. Instead of that drop, there has been a steady advance, averaging, according to the most reliable authorities who came to that conference, about 10 per cent. As wool prices have advanced since the 1st of June, I am inclined to think that the average increase in the selling price of wool received by the farmer has increased nearer 15 or 18 per cent than 10 per cent. At this conference not one word of complaint was uttered against the removal of the duty on wool.

But the conference did make complaint. It made complaint that the sheep industry was being seriously injured by dogs. Sometime before the holding of the conference referred to the United States Department of Agriculture had sent out to over 1,000 counties in different States of the Union asking these questions: "How much could the number of sheep in your county be increased without displacing any of the live stock now raised?" A majority of the answers received were to the effect that the number of sheep could be increased 150 per cent and not necessitate a reduction in any other kind of stock. The second question sent out by the department was this: "What is the reason this 150 per cent of sheep are not raised?" And the answer came from more than two-thirds of the counties, "Dogs."

So it seems that wool and sheep have not gone to ruination under the free listing of wool, but that they have gone to the "dogs." I expect that this will make all puppies popular hereafter with the calamity howlers' brigade, and that while market prices go up, every puppy will be called "tariff." Because, under the Payne wool tariff, the sheep in this country in 10 years decreased over 36 per cent in number in Wisconsin and 15 per cent in the Nation in the same period, and because of the additional fact that when wool is free listed that its only enemies seem to be dogs, therefore a wool tariff and dogs go hand in hand, and both will be held high in the estimation of the average wool standpatter.

SHEEP.

Not only is wool higher in price this year than last, but the sheep itself brings a higher price. In the direful predictions of what was to happen if wool was placed on the free list, the sheep itself was included. The workings of the law of supply and demand, however, as will be seen from the table of prices that I am about to give, show that the price of sheep has raised fully 20 per cent since a year ago.

LAMBS.

Even spring lambs share in the general raise in prices. They seem to frisk and gambol about upon the green pastures with more delight and alacrity than a year ago. Evidently they have a right to, as even the price of lambs has gone up over the price paid for them last year by an average of about 18 per cent. The prices of lambs are now higher than in any July in the history of the Chicago stockyards.

HIDES.

One of the very few articles upon which the people were given relief by the Payne or Republican tariff was hides, which were placed upon the free list. For years the subject of protecting or placing hides upon the free list was warmly debated pro and con. On the one hand it was contended that the placing of a tariff duty on foreign hides entering this country would enable the farmer to secure a greater price for the hides produced by him, and that all marketable cattle would thereby command a greater price. On the other hand it was contended that in the placing of hides upon the free list the hide market would not be lowered and the farmer would get as much, if not more, for hides than under protection. Finally, they were placed upon the free list, and were continued upon the free list by the present Democratic tariff law.

An inspection of the following table will show that the prices of hides have been higher since the tariff duty was removed from the same than during the years when a heavy tariff was imposed. A bare review of this table shows that this year the price of nearly all kinds and grades of hides are higher than they have been at any time during the last 10 years, thus showing that tariff duties do not necessarily enhance the price of the home-produced article nor does free listing of the same plunge it into ruin.

PEAS.

Among the most rapidly developing, thriving, and profitable farming industries to be found in the State of Wisconsin, and especially the district which I represent, is the pea-canning industry. With us and in the Northwest it is of but comparative recent origin. There is now scarcely a village or city upon a railway but which has one or more pea-canning factories. A large acreage is devoted to this crop. The tariff on canned peas under the Payne tariff was 2½ cents per pound, and under the present tariff law it is 1 cent a pound. The pea-canning season has just finished, and I have made careful investigation and comparison of the prices paid in at least a dozen places in my district this and last year.

In many instances the land is rented for cash by the factory owners and worked by their own help. In the majority of instances, however, the farmers in the vicinity of the factory raise the peas for sale at the factory. After being drawn to and milled at the canning factory the farmer is paid, after the same are milled, a price ranging from 1¾ to 2¾ cents per pound, and averaging about 2¼ cents per pound, the average yield per acre being 2,500 pounds, and the average value of yield per acre being from $50 to $55. Such has been the general average price for at least the last four or five years.

Factory owners in many instances rent the land, plowed or unplowed, from the farmer and work and grow their own peas. The rent for unplowed land will average $11 per acre and for plowed land $13 per acre. The prices this year at all points where I made inquiry show as great a rental per acre and as great a price per pound for milled peas as in any previous year. This demonstrates that the reduction in the tariff on peas of 1½ cents a pound, or 60 per cent, has not decreased their price this year under a Democratic tariff for revenue only.

BARLEY.

Wisconsin is one of the five great barley-growing States of the Union. The time was but recently when it stood first in acreage, in yield, and in quality. According to the census, its total barley yield in 1909 was, in round numbers, 22,156,000 bushels, valued at $12,682,000. The tariff on this article was reduced from 30 to 15 cents per bushel. At the six different points investigated in my district on the last week in February, the first week in April, and the 11th of June, 1914, I found the average price of barley paid direct to the farmer higher by from 4 to 7 cents in each instance than the market price of barley at the same periods in the year 1913.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] stated in his speech of the 11th of July, 1914:

> That the price of barley in Chicago ranged from $1.20 to $1.30 per bushel in April, 1912, and from 55 to 60 cents a bushel in April, 1914.

Such a comparison and statements are unfair and unworthy of the gentleman. It is, in fact, an insult to the intelligence of the farmers of the country as well as to the membership of the House. The gentleman knows, or ought to know, that the reason why the market price of barley in Chicago in April, 1912, was from $1.20 to $1.30 per bushel was because in the season of 1911 there was a great drought and heat spell that spread over the barley-growing regions of the country just at the ripening period, which injured the growing and ripening barley to such an extent that the yield of barley in that season was only a little more than one-half of the average barley yield per acre. In the fall of 1911 and through the winter of 1911 and 1912 and in the spring of 1912 barley did range from $1.20 to $1.30 per bushel.

But the gentleman fails to tell us that in the fall of 1912, when the barley crop for that season came in and there had been a little more than an average annual yield of barley, that barley-raising farmers could get in the markets for their barley but from 60 to 70 cents a bushel, yet the same Payne tariff on barley of 30 cents a bushel was upon the statute books and was the same tariff on barley in 1911 and in April, 1912. If the Payne barley tariff of 30 cents per bushel was responsible for barley prices ranging from October, 1911, to the coming of the 1912 new barley crop from $1.20 to $1.30 per bushel, why did not that same Payne tariff of 30 cents a bushel on barley maintain the price of barley at $1.20 to $1.30 a bushel in the fall of 1912?

Here is a fair sample of the arguments used by the army of calamity howlers now parading the country trying to fill the ears of the farmer with falsehoods, and to prove the unfairness of the gentleman and that he intended to misrepresent. I call attention to the fact that he was not fair enough in this connection to compare the price of barley in April, 1913, with April, 1914. If he had made such a comparison and was reporting the true results, he would have to say that barley in 1914 brought on the average from 6 to 10 cents more per bushel than in 1913.

POTATOES.

The tariff on potatoes was reduced from 25 cents a bushel and placed upon the free list, except that if potatoes are imported from a country that imposes duties upon potatoes imported from the United States, that, then, such potatoes shall pay a tariff duty of 10 per cent ad valorem. This prevents the importation of potatoes from Canada excepting upon the payment of such 10 per cent ad valorem, and our quarantine laws and regulations act as a formidable barrier to the importation of potatoes from other countries. During the first four months under the new tariff law some 3,260,000 bushels of potatoes were imported into the United States. If this rate were maintained throughout the year, we might expect a total annual importation of 10,000,000 bushels per annum.

The annual yield of potatoes, however, is very uncertain and variable. For instance, in the year 1912, the United States imported nearly 14,000,000 bushels, notwithstanding that there was then a tariff duty on the same of 25 cents per bushel. The trouble in that year was that the drought of the previous year of 1911 had rendered the yield of potatoes in that year very scarce and limited. Notwithstanding such large importation in that year, the farmers of the country prospered. It again forcibly illustrates the rule or law of supply and demand. Notwithstanding the reduction of the duty on potatoes in the present tariff law, the price at all times since the 1st of October, 1913, has been higher than during the same period in the previous years.

LOCAL MARKETS.

For the preparation of these remarks I have gathered market quotations in five different places in my district for this year and last, and have caused the same to be verified. The statement of prices that I herewith present shows the average prices paid to the farmer in my district at the periods named in this and last year. They do not represent the prices paid by the consumer after the farm products have passed through the hands of the middleman, but the prices actually received by the farmer.

IMPORT OF FARM PRODUCTS.

When the prophets of ruin and calamity are confronted with positive facts proving that the prices of nearly all farm products are higher this year than at the same time last year, they resort to other tactics equally in vain and equally false. They then try to blind the farmers and the public with claims and prophecies that vast imports of farm products are coming into this country in competition with our home farm products. They contend that if the prices of the articles which the farmer has to sell have not yet been lowered below that of last year, that the imports from foreign countries will soon result in flooding the American markets with foreign goods, thereby depriving the American farmer of much of the market that he would otherwise enjoy.

With saddened countenances, with faltering voices, and with crocodile tears they refer to the increased imports from foreign countries since the 3d of October last, when the present tariff law went into effect. With great and false solicitude they are trying to blind the farmers and the general public with those increased imports and with the prospect of a continuance of the same. So far they have only been able to point to increased imports during the life of the present tariff in eggs, corn, beef, and potatoes, and a few minor articles.

EGGS.

Eggs imported from China is one of their ghost stories. It will be remembered that the tariff on eggs in the Payne tariff bill was fixed at 5 cents per dozen, and in the Underwood tariff bill they are placed upon the free list. In this case it is not cheap foreign labor that they are apprehensive of, but it is the cheap Chinese hens. It is true that there has been an increased importation of eggs during the first four months of the present law. A careful investigation, however, discloses that during the month of March under the present law some 12,000 cases of eggs were imported from China to Vancouver. One-half of these were consigned from there to San Francisco and the other half remained in Vancouver. These are the vast and enormous importations of Chinese eggs which are to drive the American hen out of the laying business and ruin the American egg market with cheap prices.

During the last three months of 1913 and in January, 1914, there were imported into this country from all countries, in round numbers, 2,900,000 dozens of eggs. They were worth $613,000. For the purpose of this argument let us assume that the importation of eggs for those four months represent one-third of the annual imports of the same. In that case our total importation of eggs for the year would be worth $1,839,000. Our statistics show that in the year 1912 we exported $3,395,000 worth of eggs, more than double in value the importation of eggs from foreign countries if they continue to be imported during the remaining eight months of the year in the same proportion as during the first four months. In 1912 the average price paid us for these exported eggs was 22 cents per dozen and the average price paid for the eggs brought into the United States during those four months was 13⅞ cents a dozen. What harm, I ask, is it to the American farmer and poultryman if we import eggs at 13½ cents a dozen on the average and export twice as many at 22 cents a dozen?

Our 1910 census returns show that in that year the value of the eggs used or consumed in the United States was, in round numbers, $320,000,000. If the importation of eggs for this year continues at the same rate for the above-mentioned four months, the amount imported will be about one-half of 1 per cent of the eggs used in this country in the year 1910. There were produced in this country in 1910 1,591,000,000 dozens of eggs. How, then, I ask in all seriousness, is an egg importation of one-half of 1 per cent going to affect the price of American eggs upon the American markets? Every intelligent, impartial, and thinking person, especially farmers, can not and do not expect such a trifling importation to make any impression whatsoever upon the egg market. It will have no more effect upon the egg prices of this country than Lake Michigan would be affected if we were to take a tub of water out of it. In truth, the increased supply of spring eggs reduces the price each year far more and has a hundred times greater effect on the market than the importations spoken of.

CORN.

During the latter part of April this year the calamity newspapers of the country published with great scare headlines a report that 500,000 bushels of Argentine corn had been purchased for delivery in May in the city of Chicago. This seemed like importing coals to Newcastle. The story was so strange that it was unbelievable, and yet it was published and republished, repeated and repeated by our opponents and by a partisan press to blind the public and farmers of this country to the true workings of the present tariff law.

That able and distinguished Democrat from Illinois, Hon. H. T. RAINEY, undertook a thorough investigation of this rumor, and some time ago upon the floor of this House, he presented the result of that investigation relating to the importation of corn. After a long watchful waiting and painstaking examination, he discovered that up to the time that he made the exposure of these rumors on the 6th of last June, that only one carload of Argentine corn, containing 60,000 pounds, was delivered in Chicago, and that it was upon a contract for the delivery of this car of corn that the story that 500,000 bushels of Argentine corn was said to have been contracted for and was to be delivered in Chicago in May. According to the story of one of the partners of the firm that bought this car of corn, it was purchased and brought to Chicago by way of experiment, or trial as chicken feed. The poultry men of Chicago and vicinity evidently had found American corn so expensive for poultry feeding that as an experiment they wished to try this car of Argentine corn for chicken feeding purposes only.

His investigation disclosed that this rumor of trade or purchase of 500,000 bushels of Argentine corn was simply registered by the corn speculators in the Chicago market for the purpose of keeping down the price of corn in May. It was seized upon by those who are seeking every opportunity to slander and belittle the operation of the present tariff, and to blind farmers.

As shown by the same gentleman, a little over 7,034,000 bushels of Argentine corn was imported into this country during the four months commencing October 1, 1913, and ending February 1, 1914. At the same rate this would make for a year 21,000,000 bushels. The average annual yield of corn in this country during the last few years has been a little over 3,000,000,000 bushels. Our corn exports in 1912, including corn meal, were 41,500,000 bushels, in round numbers, so that our exports would be just about double our imports. It will thus be seen that our exports and imports combined are only about 2 per cent of our total annual production. Of the 7,000,000 bushels of corn imported during the months of October, November, and December, 1913, and January, 1914, some 4,000,000 bushels have been used exclusively by the Corn Products Co., of Edgewater, N. Y., for the manufacturing of corn products for export, and is thus used in a way that could not possibly bring it into competition with the American farmer. According to a year's average yield, we raise in this country 650 bushels of corn for every bushel of corn imported from the Argentine Republic. With only this sort of competition in corn, the price of American corn upon American markets will be reduced about as rapidly as a person can lower the level of Lake Michigan with a pail. Let it be remembered that the corn of the Argentine Republic has been exported from that country to the English markets for many years last past, and that upon those same markets American corn has been sold in millions of bushels each year in direct competition with Argentine corn. If American corn can compete successfully and at a profit with Argentine corn upon the English markets, why then is there any reason why American corn can not compete with Argentine corn on the American markets?

This is a competition that the American corn raisers had to endure for years in spite of the fact that there was a duty of 15 cents a bushel on corn. It must be remembered, too, that during all of these years when enormous quantities of American corn were being exported and sold in English markets that it was being sold at a higher price than it would command in the home market, for if it did not there would be no purpose in exporting it to the English markets.

IMPORTED BEEF.

During the last several months there has been imported into this country from Argentina dressed beef at the rate of about 9,000,000 pounds monthly. At this rate of importation the annual importations of Argentine beef will be about 108,000,000 pounds. At first blush and without reflection this seems to be an enormous quantity of beef to import. Without comparison and an analysis one would be prone to think that such an importation would displace a very large quantity of American-produced beef. If we stop to consider the same for a moment, however, we will be confronted with the fact that there are now in this country about 100,000,000 people. Imported beef to the amount of 108,000,000 pounds annually would give us a trifle of over 1 pound of beef for each person a year.

The consumption of dressed meat in the United States for the year 1909 for each person was:

	Pounds.
Beef	80.34
Veal	7.54
Pork (excluding lard)	67.61
Mutton and lamb	6.58
Lard	10.06
Total meat and lard consumed by each person on the average in 1909	172.13

No intelligent person for a moment believes that a pound of imported meat for each person in this country, will in any way whatsoever lower or affect the price of the other 172.13 pounds used by each person during the year.

Statistics further show that there is more meat consumed in the United States each year by the average person than in any other country on earth. The average amount per year used by persons in the—

	Pounds.
United Kingdom	119
Germany	113
France	80
Argentina	140
Canada	129
United States	172

Such a comparison shows the insignificant amount of American-produced beef displaced by imported beef. The effect produced by the dropping of these 108,000,000 pounds of Argentine beef into the great demand for beef in this country makes no more impression than the casting of a pebble into the Potomac. Besides, we have seen from the above figures that beef during the past year has gone up instead of down, thus showing that the importations of beef have made absolutely no impression upon the American market. Meat imports have been increasing, and meat imports must continue. The demand for beef in this country is larger than the supply.

The population of this country has increased to 100,000,000 people at the present time. During the last 14 years the population has steadily increased, thereby increasing the demand. On the other hand, during the last several years the supply of beef cattle in this country has actually diminished. Thus there has been an increase in the difference between the supply and demand from both ends. The demand, on the one hand, has increased, and the supply, on the other hand, has decreased. To meet these wide-spreading conditions, or spread between the supply and demand, it is necessary that there be some importations of meat, and those importations must increase in the near future unless our farmers produce more beef cattle than they have been producing in recent years.

To forcibly illustrate the increasing difference between the supply and demand of beef cattle in this country, let us consider official census figures. In the year 1910 there were 41,178,000 beef cattle in the United States, and in January, 1914, according to the United States Department of Agriculture, there were 35,855,000. Thus, in four years there has been a total decrease in the supply of domestic meat cattle of six and one-half million head; or, in other words, such cattle have decreased annually at the rate of 1,330,000, or 3.3 per cent.

In 1910 there were 52,448,000 sheep in the country, and in January, 1914, there were only 49,719,000, an annual average decrease in four years of 642,000, or 1.3 per cent.

In 1910 there were in this country 58,186,000 swine, and in January, 1914, according to the official estimates, there were 58,933,000, an increase in four years of only 1.3 per cent. These official statistics relating to the supply of meat animals show conclusively the wonderful increase in the spread between the supply and demand of such animals in this country.

These are natural causes, bearing no relation whatsoever to a high or low tariff, or no tariff whatsoever, which create the growing breach between supply and demand.

There is, and will continue to be for years to come, a natural increase in the population. It must be fed. There is, and will continue for years, a diversification in farming. A half a generation ago the farming lands of this country were devoted to grain raising almost exclusively, and the western or wild lands, which then covered millions and millions of acres more than at the present, were devoted to the pasturing of beef cattle. With the great growth of our city population, which is now, according to the last census, about 51 per cent of the entire population, there is a great demand for other things besides grain and beef cattle. Thousands and thousands of acres of farming lands are now and have been for recent years devoted only to the production of milk for the supply of this city population. Millions and millions of acres of farming lands which in recent years were devoted to the raising of crops are now devoted to the supply of milk, butter, and cheese to feed our cities. The increased supply of butter, milk, and cheese has taken away from the production of beef cattle and grain, millions upon millions of acres of farm lands.

This has naturally decreased the acreage formerly devoted to the raising of crops and feeding of beef cattle. From this standpoint the reason must be clear why the supply of meat animals in this country has decreased annually while the population of the country has increased. No kind of a tariff, high or low, can change these natural conditions. With the price of farm products, including meat animals, such as they are now and have been for the last few years, there is no doubt but what the American production will at all times, until our population will continue to have grown much greater, supply nearly all of the demand of our people, and if at times there is a shortage, importations must be made, and importations made under such circumstances will not be in competition with our home products, but will merely be filling a vacancy which our products are not numerous enough to fill.

Again, it must be borne in mind that it is the American packers who are slaughtering, chilling or freezing, and exporting Argentine beef from that country to this country. The export business of that country in the meat line is mainly controlled by American packers. Out of nine establishments for the chilling and exporting of meat in Argentina five are owned and operated by Chicago business concerns. They practically control the export of meat from that country to this. Certainly no one expects that the Chicago Beef Trust, which owns and controls the packing establishments in Chicago and also in Argentina, is going to be so foolish as to allow the beef which it buys in the United States and that which it buys in Argentina to get into competition in the markets of America. This is a problem that can not be settled by any tariff laws. This is a problem the Democratic Party hopes to control and solve when its new antitrust legislation, now pending, becomes a law.

According to the most recent statement of the Agricultural Department, the demand for meat has grown until not only have exports ceased, but the packers are now buying grass cattle that were formerly fed. The latest official figures of that department, for June 15, show that the packers paid on the average $7.43 for hogs, as compared with $7.10 for the previous four-year average on June 15; that $6.32 a hundred was paid on the average for beef cattle on June 15, 1914, as compared with $5.22 for the last four years; $7.69 for veal, as compared with the average price of $6.54 for the last four years; and $6.47 for lambs, as compared with $6.25 for the last four years.

The meat packers of Chicago declare that in the coming fall and winter the public will see the highest meat prices in the history of the trade. All this proves the great scarcity of meat in this country, while the demand continues to grow. With the demand increasing on the one hand and the supply diminishing on the other, the price of meat, as well as other articles of human food, will continue to rise in value whether there is a high or low tariff on such articles or no tariff at all. Under such conditions the importation of meat and food products will cause no damage to home producers until the amount of such importations, added to the home production, shall be raised to the height of the demand and leave an oversupply.

BREEDING STOCK.

On the 8th of last June the distinguished gentleman representing the minority [Mr. MANN], in attempting to answer some remarks made by his colleague from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] on the 6th of June, referred to the high-priced stock of Argentina. He read to us from the latest United States Yearbook, and he emphasized with considerable force extracts from that volume describing Argentine cattle, and exhibited a group picture of the same to the House. He laid considerable stress upon the fact that at some stock sale, an Argentine bull was sold for $35,000. It struck me at the time that he intended to convey the impression that, as breeding stock under the present law is upon the free list, there would soon be imported breeding stock from Argentina in competition with the home-raised breeding stock.

TWENTY-THOUSAND-DOLLAR BULL CALF.

That evening, while the gentleman's remarks and exhibition were fresh in my mind, I read in the Sheboygan Press, in great, big headlines, an announcement of the sale of a bull calf in the gentleman's city of Chicago. It appears that a sale of cattle had taken place near Chicago shortly before, and among the cattle sold there was a 3½ months' old bull calf, born and raised in the gentleman's State. After spirited bidding this calf was sold for $20,000.

Now, people familiar with the growth and increase in value of a calf, growing into a fully developed animal, know that when any kind of a calf, and especially a bull calf, becomes full grown and is in a state of its most usefulness, that it is worth from five to ten times as much as when it was a calf 3 months of age. So here we have the makings of a bull which will far exceed in value the Argentine bull whose picture the gentleman took so much pride in exhibiting in this House. We have coming from the gentleman's home State the makings of a $200,000 American bull. The breeders and farmers of America interested in breeding and in developing fine stock, in view of these circumstances, need have absolutely no fear of bull competition from Argentina. Intelligent and informed people also will bear in mind that the importation of stock-breeding cattle was made free under the Payne or Republican tariff law, as well as under the present Underwood tariff.

But our opponents sometimes say in reply, "Well, the reason that the prices of farm products are higher this year than last year is because there was a scarcity in last year's farm products." This is true in a small degree, and untrue in a very much larger degree. It is true that there was a shortage of about 700,000,000 bushels in the amount of corn raised last year. It is also true that the American wheat crop last year exceeded by 240,000,000 bushels any wheat crop ever produced in America, and that the price of wheat this year is higher than it has been for many recent years.

DECREASE OF COST OF LIVING.

As a last resort for the condemnation of the present tariff law our opponents sarcastically twit us with having failed to reduce the cost of living in the cities by the present tariff. It is true that the high cost of living in cities has not been reduced to the degree that the Democratic Party hoped and expected. On the other hand, it is a fact that many necessaries of life and other articles have been reduced in price to some extent. It must be borne in mind that so far the new law has been in operation only nine months, and that we have statistics available for only seven of those nine months.

In the case of meats we have discovered what I individually claimed at the time of the passage of the tariff law, that our Beef Trusts control the exports of beef from Argentina and that they will not allow those meats when imported into the United States to come into competition with the beef owned and purchased by them in America. Such has conclusively proven to be the case. On the other hand, it must be remembered that in every large and in nearly every small city there are interstate and local trusts and combinations between wholesalers and retailers, by which the natural law of supply and demand has been prevented from working in a natural manner, thus preventing many necessaries of life from being purchased cheaper. When a dozen men or corporations concentrate into their hands the meats and other products produced by the farmer and make an agreement to sell them at a fixed price to the ultimate consumer there is no competition, and we ought to have competition from abroad, if we can get it, under such circumstances, so that under such conditions there will be fair and competitive American markets in which the consumer can trade.

I hope that intelligent, impartial, and observing people will not come to the conclusion that because the Democratic Party desires to cheapen the cost of living in the cities that we intend to do so at the expense of the farmers. The Democratic Party is interested in having the farmer meet the ultimate consumer in as short a trade route as possible. Official investigation made by Secretary Wilson, of the Department of Agriculture, in the Taft administration, showed that out of $100 paid by the consumer for such farm products as form the necessaries of life that only $45 was received by the farmer, the balance going to the transportation company, the wholesaler, jobbers, and retailers. It is after the farmer's products have passed from his hands and have been combined in the possession of a few corporations, or a few men of great resources, that the price of these farm products are artificially advanced. The Democratic Party wants competition, from wherever it may be secured, brought against the trusts and combinations which buy the farmers' products at the lowest possible price, and then screw up the price of such articles when sold to the ultimate consumer. This administration has not as yet had sufficient time to reach all of these trusts, combinations, and monopolies that so deal with the products of the farmer after they have left the farmer's hands. A few weeks ago we passed antitrust legislation which is designed to break up such combinations, trusts, and monopolies, and when such laws have finally been placed upon the statute books, which we hope and believe will be the case before we adjourn, then we firmly believe that these interstate and local combinations, trusts, and monopolies which artificially and unnecessarily and outrageously raise the price of farm products after they leave the farmer's hands and before they get into the hands of the ultimate consumer, will be dissolved and destroyed.

Then there will be freer and more opportunity for the farmer to dispose of his products direct to the ultimate consumer, and no army of parasites can then grow, thrive, and feed off of both the farmer and ultimate consumer. Where there is full and free competition the price for which the farmer sells is not affected by increases or decreases of imports, unless such increased or decreased imports be large enough to create an oversupply or bring about a scarcity.

The Democratic Party in its campaign did not contend that the high tariff was the sole cause of the high cost of living. It did contend, and still contends and believes, that in very many instances it provided the shield behind which trusts, combinations, and monopolies were formed for the purpose of hammering down the price paid to the farmer, and for the purpose of screwing up the price of those products when sold to the consumer. If the people will have patience until the Democratic tariff law has been given a fuller and fairer opportunity to operate after the passage of our proposed antitrust laws, the people of this country will find great relief in all directions.

They will find the farmer receiving as much for his products, if not more, than now, and they will find the people buying the necessaries of life for less. This may seem paradoxical, but it is absolutely true. When the trusts, which are situated, thrive, and live between the farm producer and the ultimate consumer, are destroyed, then there will be less dividends to provide for trusts, combinations, and monopolies, and less of the idle middlemen to support. The farmer and the consumer will be drawn closer together, thereby enabling the farmer to secure better prices for his products and at the same time enable the ultimate consumer to buy cheaper than now.

HIGH COST OF LIVING WORLD WIDE.

The cost of living in the last few years in this country has grown very rapidly. We have been prone, however, to believe that this was peculiar alone among our people. Such, however, is not the case, for the general complaint against the high cost of living has prevailed in all civilized nations. There has been a growth in this cost everywhere—in some countries greater than in others—and it is usually due to the same causes.

Prof. John B. C. Kershaw, fellow of the Royal Statistical Society, of London, who is widely known as a student and expert, wrote an article upon the subject, which was published in the Scientific American of March 21, 1914. He points out in that article in detail the reasons which he considers responsible for the great rise in the cost of living throughout the world, and shows that this condition is not peculiar to any one nation. He says in part:

The rise in the prices during the last 15 years has not only been great, but general. It applies to almost all commodities and to all countries for which we have figures.

The principle cause for this he attributes is the continued growth in population of the world, the increased demand for luxuries, and the extravagant way in which the present generation is exhausting the material resources of the earth. Food and other commodities of life are dearer, in his opinion, because of the increase in the number who want them, and they are becoming more scarce. According to his opinion the outlook seems to indicate that the rise in prices is permanent and is likely to be aggravated in future years.

He includes in his article a table showing the level of food products from 1900 to 1912, inclusive. From this table it appears that the price of necessary food articles usually used by the workingman have gradually raised in price from 1900 to 1912, inclusive, in the countries hereafter named as follows:

	Per cent.
In the United Kingdom	15
In France	15
In Germany	30
In Holland	23
In Italy	20
In Russia	21
In Canada	51
In Australia	16
In New Zealand	16
In United States	39
In Norway	19

Judging from this world-wide rise in the cost of food products, it must be apparent to all, that in the question of the cost of living we have a world-wide problem, and not alone an American one. Under such circumstances it is unreasonable to suppose that any tariff law, high or low, that may be passed by Congress will materially affect the cost of living one way or the other. So far as the high cost of living is due to artificial reasons, and not to the law of supply and demand, the only relief is in regulation, control, or destruction of trusts, combinations, and monopolies in all matters, and especially in dealing with the necessaries of life, both in interstate and intrastate commerce. The Democratic Party hopes that by the passage of the proposed antitrust legislation and its enforcement after passage to in a large measure control and destroy the evil practices of such trusts, combinations, and monopolies.

DEMOCRATIC PROTECTION FOR THE FARMER.

The Democratic Party has since the days of Jefferson been not only the traditional but practical friend of the farmers. It has at all times constituted itself the champion of their welfare. Through its efforts it has manifested and put into practice during this administration its professions of friendship.

A Democratic House in 1911 inaugurated and passed a country-wide parcel-post system in connection with the Post Office Department. For more than a generation this valuable means for the transportation of small packages has been a part of the postal system of nearly every civilized country. Its merits had been demonstrated. The demand for it in this country had been for nearly a generation widespread. For 16 long years, while the Republican Party was in power, these demands were repeatedly presented to Congress, and repeatedly Republican Congresses turned deaf ears to the appeals of the farmers and consumers of the country. Finally in 1911, in response to the long, continued, and widespread demand on the part of the people, a Democratic House inaugurated and passed this most valuable piece of legislation.

This particular branch of the public service has been during the present administration, in charge of that able and distinguished Democratic statesman, Hon. A. S. Burleson, the ablest and most progressive Postmaster General that has been at the head of our Post Office Department in the history of our Government. Under him and through his efforts of practical management, the parcel-post system has been extended throughout the length and breadth of the land. Repeated extensions of its usefulness have been successfully established and are now in operation. The weights permitted to be carried have been increased, and the rates for carriage decreased.

Already so great has been the volume of business transacted by this branch of the Post Office Department that express rates on all commodities not exceeding the weight permitted to be carried by the parcel-post system have been reduced by an average of about three-quarters of the charges previously made by express companies.

When the farmer and ultimate consumer become familiar with this great system, it will enlarge direct trade between them and will bring the farmer higher prices for his produce, and at the same time enable the consumer to buy such produce at a chaper price than where the same has been handled by the middleman or the retailer. This system is but in its infancy, and in the course of two or three years more under the present able administration there will undoubtedly be a wonderful increase in this direction, thus conferring the benefit on the farmer and the consumer.

In order to describe the great benefits which it is contemplated shall be rendered in the near future by the Parcel Post Service, I take the liberty of quoting liberally from the words of the present able Postmaster General:

The Parcel Post Service is at a turning point in its history. It must respond to the increasing demand for closer, quicker, and surer communication between our people. The facilities it has always controlled have become more important and new facilities have been added, but the people are looking to it for still greater and wider performance.

The successful postmaster or executive officer may no longer be a passive agent. He must develop with the demand for the service and keep abreast of the best modern business thought.

Phenomenal as has been the growth and development of the parcel post, the new service is still in its infancy. We have but scratched the surface of its possibilities for usefulness. Further experience will no doubt justify further extensions of service and revisions of rates and conditions of mailability that will have the effect of vastly increasing the traffic. Improved methods of postal operation and increased efficiency will bring about a more satisfactory and complete service.

IT UNITED PRODUCER AND CONSUMER.

Postmasters can render great service in the reduction of the high cost of living by bringing together those who wish to buy and those who wish to sell farm products. With the agencies at his command, the postmaster should secure the names of those farmers who can supply farm produce in retail shipments, together with the quantities available and the prices asked. This information he should furnish to the patrons of his office and of other offices where the patrons wish to secure direct shipments of such fresh food products. Thought and ingenuity will enable each postmaster to supplement this general plan in whatever ways are best suited to the local conditions. Postmasters should also make a careful study of conditions under which the farmers within their reach now market their produce and under which their city patrons secure food products. This will enable postmasters to present more convincing arguments for the use of the parcel post and to render valuable service to their communities in reducing the cost of living.

Postmasters should urge the organization of "shipping clubs" among their rural and city customers for the purpose of using in the most effective manner the parcel post as a means of exchange of produce. It is particularly desiraole to encourage organizations of farmers for cooperation in shipping farm products.

This interest and activity of the Democratic Party in extending the Parcel Post System is in fulfillment of a plank contained in its national platform of 1912, in which it was declared:

We favor the establishment of a parcel post or postal express, and also the extension of the rural delivery system as rapidly as practicable.

AGRICULTURAL EXTENSION BILL.

The 1912 Democratic national platform contains the following plank in relation to agricultural extension teaching:

We recognize the value of vocational education, and urge Federal appropriation for such training and extension teaching in agriculture in cooperation with the several States.

In compliance with this platform pledge, Congress has passed what is known as the Lever agricultural extension bill, making provisions for cooperative agricultural extension work between the agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, and the acts supplementary thereto, and the United States Department of Agriculture. Its purpose is to "provide for the commencement of cooperative agricultural extension work, field demonstrations, publications, and otherwise," carried on in a way mutually agreeable to the Secretary of Agriculture and the land-grant colleges receiving the benefits of such acts. In brief, it undertakes to make such provisions as will bring to the attention of the farmer and the farmers' wives and children in the most striking manner such demonstrated truths and practices as to make up the most up-to-date methods in agriculture, which, if lived up to, will make rural living desirable and profitable as an occupation. It aims to carry to the farmer the improved methods and practices of the agricultural colleges, experiment stations, the Department of Agriculture, and the best farmer, and demonstrate their value upon the farm itself, thus providing the means by which the agricultural institutions may be made to serve all the people, as should be the case, rather than a limited and privileged few.

The bulletins from the agricultural press have not been sufficient to reach the farmer in the remote districts, who most needs the agricultural information which the Department of Agriculture and State experiment stations and agricultural colleges have accumulated for the last 50 years. It aims for practical demonstrations in the most enlightened farming methods.

The late Dr. Seaman A. Knapp, founder of the demonstration work in this country, said:

There is much knowledge applicable and helpful to husbandry that is annually worked out and made available by the scientists in the United States Department of Agriculture and in the State experiment stations and by individual farmers upon their farms which is sufficient to readjust agriculture and place it upon a basis of greater profit, to reconstruct the rural home, and to give to country life an attraction, a dignity, and a potential influence it has never received. This body of knowledge can not be conveyed and delivered by a written message to the people in such a way that they will accept and adopt it. This can only be done by personal appeal and ocular demonstration.

By this law there is permanently appropriated $480,000 each year to each State which will agree to the provisions of the law. Increases are provided for during the first seven years, and after that time there is permanently appropriated for each year the sum of $4,100,000, in addition to the said sum of $480,000, which is to be distributed among the several States in the proportion which the rural population of each State bears to the total rural population of all the States. In short, it means and provides the funds for the payment of expenses of practical agricultural experts who will go out among the farmers of the State and demonstrate to them—so that the eye of the farmer may see—the practical workings of the most up-to-date and scientific methods of farming.

This piece of legislation was demanded by the rural population of the country and will soon be in successful operation. While it was pending every school, large or small, interested in the development of agricultural information and knowledge petitioned for its speedy passage. This demand had existed for many years prior to its passage. The law will be put to good use in instructing the farmer and his children in practical and up-to-date farming activities.

ANNUAL INCREASE OF AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION.

The splendid work of the Department of Agriculture has been recognized by this administration and encouraged by an increased appropriation of $1,524,000 over the largest annual appropriation made during the Taft administration. The total amount appropriated by this Congress for agricultural purposes, exclusive of permanent annual appropriations, being $19,511,000, making a total annual with permanent appropriations of over $24,000,000 for farming purposes.

Among the many important improvements made in the work of the Department of Agriculture is a new division known as Farm Management. The duties of this division are to make an investigation of the cost of producing farm products under varying farm conditions, distribution of investment, relative return of different systems of farm management, ascertaining previous experience in farm management in this and other countries, development and plans for building better farm dwellings, study of the cheapest and most effective method of eradicating weeds and cultivating the soil, and, in fact, to make a study of a thousand and one phases of farm life and publish the results thereof.

OFFICE OF MARKETS.

The Democratic administration has established in the Department of Agriculture a division known as the Office of Markets, and has secured an appropriation therefor of $200,000 for this year. It is the belief of the present administration of the Department of Agriculture that effective and economical methods for properly distributing and marketing farm products are of equal importance to the farmer and country at large as are scientific methods of production. There is no profit in it for the farmer to improve the quality and increase the quantity of his crops if he can not learn when, how, and where to sell them to the best advantage. Without some advantageous means of directly connecting the producer and consumer both of them suffer. It is sought to prevent abundant harvests from being allowed to be sold at ruinous prices in glutted markets, while insufficient supplies cause exorbitant prices and unsatisfied want at other points

It is believed that when this work has been fully organized the department will be able to assist the farmer in disposing of his crops as effectively as it has assisted him in producing them. Some of the principal lines of investigation which will be undertaken in connection with this work are: Cooperative production and marketing; market surveys, methods and cost; market grades and standards; city marketing and distribution; transportation of farm produce; storage problems; marketing miscellaneous products; and marketing by parcel post. This work will bring about a much cheaper and more equitable distribution of farm produce, and the farmer will thereby be the chief beneficiary of such improvement, and the consumer will also have his share in this reduced and cheaper plan of distribution. Heretofore the Government has devoted its energies almost entirely to the problem of increasing farm production, but recent experience has demonstrated that it is of equal importance to the farmer that his crop should be marketed in such a manner as to enable him to secure a better price for his products, and at the same time enable the consumer to purchase necessary food cheaper.

BIRD LAW.

It has appropriated $50,000 annually for the protection of insect-devouring birds of the country. The farmers of the country have in years past and are at the present time losing millions of dollars in crops because of crop-destroying insects, until it has become apparent that the annual loss to farmers from these insects alone amounts to millions of dollars. Recent experiments have shown the value of insect-devouring birds in helping to save the farmer's crops from the powers of ravage. This work, it is estimated, will finally save the farmers of the country millions of dollars annually.

HOG CHOLERA.

In the fall and early winter of 1913–14, when hog cholera swept the northwest section of the country, destroying thousands of hogs, valued at millions of dollars, the Democratic Congress rose to the occasion and made a special appropriation of $600,000 for the purpose of assisting in the control and extermination of this great destroyer of hogs, one of the greatest sources of the farmers' wealth.

The Democratic House during the present session has shown its interest in farm postal highways, and has mapped out and planned a system of such highways to be built and constructed in connection with the highway departments or commissions of the different States. As the bill passed the House the bill contained an annual appropriation of $25,000,000. Heretofore millions of dollars have been appropriated annually for the improvement of rivers and harbors, for the building of battleships, for the building of fortifications, and for dozens of other Government objects, but up to this time this is the first and only appropriation made by the Federal Government to aid the States in building, constructing, and improving farm highways. It is the beginning of an improvement which is destined in years to come to spread all over the country in every direction, to the great advantage of the farmer and his real estate.

It has aided the farmer in a score of other important directions and has vigorously enforced the oleomargarine laws, which are designed to protect the farmers' butter products from deception and fraud in the butter markets of the country.

CONCLUSION.

The facts here presented must prove, beyond successful denial, to every intelligent and impartial farmer or other person that the market prices paid to farmers for their produce or crops during nine months of the present Democratic tariff have been, on the average and in general, with only one or two minor exceptions, higher than in the year 1913 under the Payne tariff. These facts also demonstrate beyond successful contradiction that the increase in a few imported farm products has not injured, damaged, or lowered the price of the American farmer's products. These facts demonstrate that the great natural law of supply and demand is of far greater controlling force than any tariff law, whether made by Republicans, Democrats, or Bull Moose. The foregoing statements of facts also conclusively show, especially with reference to farm crops, that the price varies with the yield, and the yield depends upon the weather, over which no tariff has control, and over which Providence alone has control.

Let the farmers of this country bear well in mind that the members of the Democratic Party are as much interested in their prosperity and welfare as their fellow citizens who wear the Republican Party label. Tariff laws that work, or may work, an injury to the farmer, injure Democrats as well as Republicans, and there is no reason for distrusting the Democratic Party in its management of the tariff where it is made up of individuals as honest and sincere in their motives as are the individuals of the Republican Party. When stripped of calamity howling and partisan coloring there remains but an honest difference of opinion between them on this important subject. I take it for granted that the average member of each party is equally interested in maintaining and promoting the welfare and prosperity of the farmer. How, then, shall it be determined what party is right in its contention upon this subject? There is only one way, and that is to let the facts determine who is right. The facts that I have here presented, comparing the market prices received by the farmer during nine months under a Democratic tariff, show that such prices were higher in general and on the average than in the same months in the year 1913 under the Payne-Aldrich tariff.

If circumstances in the future, of which there are no indications now, should show that the present tariff is exposing the products of the American farmer to a competition which in itself lowers the price of his products, the Democratic Party can be safely depended upon to so alter the tariff as to give the American farmer equal justice and equity in the administration of the tariff laws. Until then let the army of calamity howlers practice in the wilderness, and then farmers and the rest of the country are certain to enjoy peace and prosperity.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 17824, the general deficiency appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from consideration of House joint resolution 300, extending appropriations, and to consider the same in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from further consideration of House joint resolution 300, and to consider the same in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection?

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I wish to say to the gentleman that I desire to have a little debate upon this resolution. I am perfectly willing to undertake the consideration of it now, but I wish the gentleman to agree that I shall have time for that purpose.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection. I might wish to say something in reply. How much time does the gentleman wish?

Mr. GILLETT. I do not think more than 5 or 10 minutes, unless in retort to something that might be said.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The situation is this. Objection was made to-day to the consideration of this resolution because of the failure on the part of the managers on the part of the House and the Senate to agree on the legislative and District appropriation bills. Those bills have been agreed to. To-morrow is the 15th, when the present appropriations expire, and it may or may not be possible to consider this resolution in the House to-morrow. To-morrow is Calendar Wednesday. The resolution should be passed to-night. I am perfectly willing to have whatever discussion may be desired at this time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, do I understand from the gentleman's statement that to-morrow will be the last day?

Mr. FITZGERALD. To-morrow is the 15th.

Mr. STAFFORD. So that it would be ample time to consider it to-morrow?

Mr. FITZGERALD. But to-morrow is Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. GILLETT. But it would require unanimous consent no more to-morrow than to-night.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But it would require "more" unanimous consent to-morrow than it does to-night.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think, Mr. Speaker, it ought to go over until to-morrow.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I conferred with the gentleman from Illinois when the arrangement was made about the agreement on the District bill, and he stated that he would inform the gentleman from Massachusetts that he would not object further to the resolution. It is important that it go through to-day.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the resolution include the District bill and also the legislative bill——

Mr. FITZGERALD. No——

Mr. STAFFORD. That has been agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The District bill has been agreed to and probably will be signed to-morrow. The only bills now undisposed of are the Indian appropriation bill and the sundry civil bill, outside of the river and harbor bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, it is not possible to have an agreement on those three bills by to-morrow, I take it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Until the House disposes of the deficiency bill the gentleman from Massachusetts and myself are unable to go to conference on the sundry civil bill.

Mr. MOORE. Are the river and harbor appropriations affected by this resolution at all?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No, they are not.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, on the statement of the gentleman from New York, I will not interpose any objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 300) to continue the provisions of a joint resolution approved June 30, 1914, entitled "Joint resolution extending appropriations for the necessary operations of the Government and of the District of Columbia under certain contingencies."

Resolved, etc., That the provisions of a joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution extending appropriations for the necessary operations of the Government and of the District of Columbia under certain contingencies," approved June 30, 1914, are extended and continued in full force and effect for and during the last half of the month of July, fiscal year 1915; and to continue during the last half of the month of July, fiscal year 1915, the operation of the Interstate Commerce Commission in securing a valuation of the several classes of property of carriers subject to the act to regulate commerce, authorized by the act of March 1, 1913, a sufficient amount is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, not to exceed the sum of $65,000, together with any unexpended balance of a similar sum appropriated for the first half of said month of July.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, this is certainly an extraordinary situation. Here we are at half past 6, nothing like a quorum present, and it is impossible undoubtedly to get a quorum, and yet this very important resolution, extending the appropriations for the sundry civil bill, an enormous bill, and the Indian appropriation bill, is brought up and unanimous consent is asked for its passage—and that is the only way it could be passed. It seems to me that illustrates the inherent incapacity of the Democratic Party to administer this Government, which is the charge which on this side of the House we have not only this year but in previous years continuously made. If any one gentleman wished to raise an objection, it would be impossible for this resolution to pass, and, in fact, the grounds upon which the gentleman from New York asks to pass it now is because to-morrow in a full House unanimous consent probably would not be granted, and unless it was passed to-morrow the Government would be incapable of paying its officials. So that that side of the House, the party which is responsible for the business management of the country, has put itself in this predicament. It put itself in the same predicament two weeks ago. I think the inconvenience and confusion which exists by not passing the appropriation bills before the end of the fiscal year is not generally appreciated. The press here in Washington, which has, of course, peculiar interest in Washington matters, has called repeated attention to the unfortunate result of the District bill being held up, because the bathhouses are closed; but that is simply one illustration of what is going on all over the country in different departments.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. Are salaries involved in this proposition at all? If we fail to pass this resolution now, would we be holding up the salaries of workmen employed by the Government in any of the departments?

Mr. GILLETT. Oh, yes; the sundry civil bill covers a great many. Of course, the legislative bill has gone through.

Mr. MOORE. There were complaints last year from many employees in the Government service—I think some in the customs service—that they were held up and could not get their pay. Would that same condition arise now if we failed by unanimous consent to let this resolution go through?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. Then, if any one Member of the House should exercise the power, which the gentleman has correctly stated any one Member has, to object to the passage of the resolution at this time, that Member might be responsible for deferring the payment of wages to Government employees, who, of course, might be sorely in need thereof.

Mr. GILLETT. Yes; that is what I criticize; that that side of the House should allow any such condition to exist where any one man, perhaps with legitimate reason, could prevent the bill becoming effective at the proper time, and then there would be these without any provision being made for their salary. Now, two weeks ago, as I say, the same thing happened, and then one extension was made. But I happened in one of the departments to-day, and as I came out an official asked me if the legislative bill was likely to go through to-day. I said I did not know. He said, "I hope it will, because if it does not there are seven clerks in our employ who for the last 14 days have been thrown out of work because they were not employed under a continuing appropriation, and therefore the continuing of the appropriation of last year did not provide any salaries for them, and they had to be dropped." And undoubtedly that is going on in various departments, causing not only confusion, but expense to the Government.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. I notice that the legislative bill was delayed being introduced in the House until June 17 of this year.

Mr. FITZGERALD. When?

Mr. GILLETT. Not the 17th.

Mr. STAFFORD. On what date was it introduced?

Mr. GILLETT. The legislative bill was introduced long before that. That was the sundry civil bill, was it not?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have in my hand H. R. 15279, an act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of the Government, and it states it was received in the House of Representatives on June 17, 1914, in order to be printed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is when it came back from the Senate.

Mr. STAFFORD. That passed the House April 17, 1914.

The purpose of my rising was to make this inquiry: During the prior administrations, when the Republicans were in control, this legislative bill was oftentime presented in the House within three weeks after the first assembling of the session. Can the gentleman inform the committee as to the reason for the delay in not presenting it to the House earlier for consideration?

Mr. GILLETT. I will leave that to the chairman of the committee; but what the gentleman suggests about the promptness of the Republican administrations is borne out by the report which the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] filed when he first introduced the resolution to continue the appropriation for 15 days. He cited there all the Congresses from the Fifty-fourth to the present in which it had been necessary to introduce such a resolution. And if you will notice, in the last Congress, the first Congress where the Democratic Party came into control after that time, a similar resolution had to be introduced for about half a dozen bills. I do not blame the Democratic Party particularly for that, because I recognize that in the last Congress the Senate was Republican, and I appreciate that it is quite different when one House belongs to one political party and another House to another political party, because then no one party has the responsibility and the pressure which responsibility brings upon it to compel the bills to be passed in due time.

So, as I say, I do not criticize the Democratic Party for the Sixty-second Congress, because the Senate was Republican and the responsibility was shared, but in this Congress, where both the Senate and the House are Democratic, and where there is a responsibility on that party alone to see that the appropriation bills are passed before the 1st of July, in this Congress, I do criticize and condemn the majority that has control of the House.

And I wish to call attention to the fact which appears upon this report made by the gentleman from New York, that from the Fifty-third Congress, which is the last Congress of Democratic control until the Sixty-second Congress, when the Democrats took control again, in those 16 years, when the Republican Party had control of both branches of the legislature, there was not a single case where all the appropriation bills were not passed before the 1st of July. That marks the contrast between the business efficiency of the Republican Party and the business management of the Democratic Party. The last Democratic Congress—the Fifty-third—failed to pass the appropriation bills on time. The following eight Republican Congresses were always prompt, and now this Democratic Congress fails again. It is that discrepancy to which I call attention, because I do think that while passing these temporary resolutions for 15 days at a time does in a certain manner tide over the difficulty, and the public at large probably feels that it makes no difference, and that the Democratic Party is doing its duty; yet, as a matter of fact, it makes a great difference. The Treasury Department becomes greatly confused in its accounts. Often in many items it is very difficult to apportion the one twenty-fourth of the amount which is appropriated. And therefore good business management always requires that the appropriation bills for the ensuing year should be passed before the commencement of that year. That was done for 16 years by the Republican Party. And now, just as soon as the Democratic Party gets in power, they repeat their former practice and begin to illustrate what we have always criticized them for, namely, their inefficiency and their incapacity for business management.

Now, I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Speaker. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts overlooked the Fifty-first Congress. That was a somewhat famous Republican Congress. It was a notorious Congress; not only Republican, but notorious in the annals of the Congresses of the United States. The first session of that Congress extended until October 1, 1890, or 93 days beyond the fiscal year ending June 30, 1890. The joint resolution of June 30, 1890, continued the appropriations for 1890 for 30 days. They were further continued until August 14, 1890, by joint resolution of July 30, 1890, and they were continued until August 29, 1890, by joint resolution of August 14; so that not until the 29th day of August was that most notorious of all Republican Congresses able to pass the appropriation bills. There was less excuse for that Congress than others, because that was the Congress, if I recall correctly, when there was a complete revolution in the procedure in the House by which the extensive filibustering indulged in prior to that time had made it difficult to transact the public business, and by the change the public business was very greatly expedited.

So far as I am personally concerned, Mr. Speaker, I assume no responsibility whatever for any delay that has taken place in the enactment of the appropriation bills into law. I endeavored to have the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill considered in the House prior to the consideration of the bill for the repeal of the Panama Canal tolls. I pointed out to various gentlemen the difficulties attending the adjustment of the appropriation bills and the danger that resulted from any attempt to delay their consideration in the House. It was suggested that the Panama Canal tolls bill would take very little time in either body, and that it would not delay the consideration of the legislative bill. The legislative bill had to be deferred until after that bill was considered here, and it was delayed considerably in its consideration by the House.

I protested against the rule that was suggested for the consideration of the antitrust legislation to the exclusion of all other public business in the House. I emphasized the fact that the sundry civil appropriation bill was then practically ready and that it should be given right of way; that it was imperative that it should be given the right of way if it were to be enacted into law before the 30th of June, the end of the fiscal year. The bill could have been brought into the House and considered very much earlier than it was possible to have it considered, because the antitrust bills were under consideration.

When the sundry civil bill was before the House I did everything in my power to expedite its consideration, but, for one reason or another, the Members of the House, exercising their privileges under the rules, continually delayed the proceedings of the House by useless points of no quorum and fruitless roll calls and refusals to remain in session after 5.30 or 6 o'clock.

Certainly, I was punished more severely than anyone else by protracted sessions, because I was compelled to be here all the time during the consideration of the bill while many gentlemen who aided in the frittering away of valuable time made themselves conspicuous, temporarily, by the suggestion of the absence of a quorum and then were able to absent themselves later when it was necessary for myself to be present during the consideration of the bill. I know that I was compelled to suffer some of the inconveniences that persons suffer from sometimes who, for one reason or another, are compelled to go without food for a considerable length of time. There were three or four days, Mr. Speaker, when I was unable to obtain any lunch and practically no dinner.

Anyone who desires to understand just how necessary food is to the human body need only to be put in charge of such a bill and spend eight or nine hours on the floor of the House with an empty stomach, combating all the pugnacious and antagonistic Members of the House, and he will quickly learn to appreciate the value of regular meals. I repeat that, so far as I am concerned, there is no responsibility upon me for any delay in the consideration or passage of these bills.

It is true that for 16 years the Republicans passed the appropriation bills very speedily and before the termination of the fiscal year; but it must also be recalled that those 16 years were the most profligate and wasteful in the entire history of the Government. The cost of the Federal Government during that period increased about 150 per cent. It would not have increased with such startling rapidity if the necessary time had been taken to resist the insistence of another body and to compel the elimination of items from the appropriation bills that should not have been incorporated in them. I know that there was a general disposition during those 16 years—because I was here during the larger portion of them—to expedite the appropriation bills and to adjourn the Congress; and the underlying motive of that haste and that speed was to make it impossible for the Congress to consider legislation imperatively needed and insistently demanded by the country, in order that those who were fattening and growing rich under the Republican laws might be relieved of their special privileges and some relief be given to the masses of the people.

It was the prevalence and the continuation of that policy which finally resulted in the uprising of the people and brought in a Democratic Congress and the election of the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] as the first Democratic Speaker in the House in many years.

That Congress, the Sixty-second, had considerable difficulty with the appropriation bills. The departments were all in the control of the Republicans. The Senate was in the control of the Republicans. They had been leading a reckless, profligate existence, under the encouragement of Republican Congresses They resisted every effort that was made to cut down useless appropriations, to eliminate useless offices, and to bring back the Government to a sound financial basis. It was necessary to combat the Senate at every point. There was really very little encouragement, although much ostensible encouragement from the Executive in the attempted reform during that period.

In June, 1912, the two parties held two great political conventions, and practically by unanimous consent suspended the business of Congress for more than a month in order that the Members of both Houses might attend those political conventions. Whatever delay resulted during that time must have been equally shared by the representatives of the two parties.

What is there extraordinary about this resolution? It is designed to maintain the Government in a lawful, orderly, and proper manner. All of the appropriation bills with the exception of two, the Indian appropriation bill and the sundry civil appropriation bill, are practically laws. The legislative and District appropriation bills were agreed upon to-day. Would the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] have preferred that the House yield to the unreasonable and improper demands of another body and permit the incorporation into those bills of items that should not be in them in order that the bills might have been agreed to prior to the 30th of June?

So far as I was concerned, I preferred that we should discuss and determine those questions, not in the interest of those little groups that desired special privileges and favors in those appropriation bills, but determine them in the interest of all of the people of the United States. Any one Member could object and prevent the passage of this resolution to-day. If he did so, it would unquestionably be taken up and passed on Thursday. I think a parliamentary expedient could be found that would make it simple enough to pass it upon that day. But to-morrow is the last day to which the appropriations have been continued, and it would result in considerable confusion if that day passed without the resolution being agreed upon. It would result in very much embarrassment to a great army of Republicans who, through some fortuitous circumstances, have not yet been separated from the pay rolls of the Government, as, in my opinion, they should be, because the more speedily they are eliminated the better and more efficient administration of the public affairs we are likely to have. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Of course I understand that the criticism of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] is really Pickwickian. He does not mean it. He knows he does not mean it, because if he had been really desirous of making trouble he would have attempted to tie up the governmental service as affected by those two appropriation bills, by preventing the passage of this resolution. It is one of those good-natured criticisms that are indulged in in parliamentary bodies, that will not have any peculiar, permanent, beneficial effect, but serves the same purpose as the safety valve upon a boiler. Now that the pressure has been removed, he is glad that we will proceed with the consideration of the public business and an orderly maintenance of the various departmental services. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words in response to what the gentleman has said. It is very true that I might, if I had wished, have tied up this resolution, as any one man might. I have no such purpose. While reprobating and regretting the predicament in which we are, that these great appropriation bills should be dependent upon the will of any one person, yet I recognize that it is desirable that this resolution should go through. But I do think it is very appropriate that there should be pointed out the defects and bad management which brought us into this position.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] said that the legislative and District bills went through to-day so that they are not covered by this resolution. That is very true, Mr. Speaker. But why did they go through to-day? We all know the real reason. The real reason is that they went through to-day because this resolution not being privileged under the parliamentary rules, it could not be adopted without a rule, and it is impossible for the Democratic Party to get a quorum of their own on the Committee on Rules.

That is another phase which might well be criticized. Because they could not get that, it was necessary for them to come to an agreement on the legislative and District bills, for it would certainly have been a shocking sight for the country if these two bills had failed and this resolution had also failed so that the whole force covered by them could not be paid, just because the Committee on Rules of this Democratic Committee on Rules could not get a quorum. I think that is a sufficient explanation, and in itself is a severe criticism of the management of that side of the House.

The gentleman from New York says that we were prevented and delayed by constant calls for quorums. That is true, but I think it is but fair to suggest that these points of order and delay and filibuster came from that side of the House. It did not come from this side of the House. They are responsible for it.

I did not when I began, and I do not now, pretend to apportion the blame for this delay and mismanagement. I do not know, and I do not say, whether it was the administration with its measures and the pressure it brought upon the House to carry those measures through ahead of the appropriation bills that caused the trouble, or whether it was the Committee on Rules that manages the House—I do not determine who made the trouble. All I have a right to say is that the Democratic Party is responsible. The Democratic Party has full control of the House, and it is responsible, and it may apportion the blame upon all the branches of the Government and such committees of this House as it pleases. But it can not shift responsibility from itself.

The gentleman from New York indulges in the usual talk of Republican extravagance and profligacy. We have never claimed, as that party always has, to be the special disciples and advocates of economy, but when the gentleman reproaches us for extravagance he must have forgotten the record that this Congress is making. He must have forgotten some remarks he made in this House not long ago reproaching that side of the House for the extravagance which they were developing in every direction. I venture to say that when at the end of this Congress the gentleman comes to make the report, which the chairman of the Appropriations Committee always has to make, of the expenditures of this Congress, he will find it very hard to reconcile them with the Democratic platform and professions and the charges against the Republican Party in which he now indulges.

Now, as to the Fifty-first Congress, which he refers to, it is noticeable that he has to go back 24 years for a Republican precedent. During the whole 16 years of recent Republican control there is not a single case of such legislation. The Fifty-first Congress was very different from this. That was a Congress where the Republicans had such a narrow majority that it was necessary for every man to be constantly present, because it was the Congress where that side of the House did not simply filibuster in the ordinary way, but that side of the House absented itself day after day in a body from the Chamber, and compelled this side of the House, with its very slender majority, to keep a quorum, only one man on that side of the House being present to insist on obstructive motions. With such difficulties, it is no wonder that all legislation was delayed.

That was the Congress where the Reed rules were adopted, and that of itself was a revolution which absorbed a vast amount of time. It was the Congress of the McKinley bill, and, above all, it was the Congress of the most vicious and desperate filibuster ever known in these Halls, a filibuster that would not be tolerated to-day. Members would not now dare to absent themselves in a body and leave the Chamber to their opponents, because public sentiment would condemn them for not doing their duty. It was against that kind of obstruction that that Congress had to legislate.

So, as I say, the gentleman has to go back to 1891 for a Republican precedent. But what I wish to draw attention to is that after 16 years of business management, where the appropriation bills went through on time and there was no necessity for the extension which so demoralizes the Government, the very first year the Democratic Party has control of the administration and of Congress appears that defect for which we have always criticized them—inherent incapacity for business management.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the legislative bill was agreed upon to-day because a majority of the House voted for the motion which I made, which made possible agreement between the Houses.

The District bill was agreed to to-day because the Senate made concessions to the House that the House insisted upon; otherwise there could not have been an agreement. So far as the inability to obtain a quorum of the Committee on Rules in order to do business is concerned, let me say that there was no difficulty in obtaining a quorum. There was a quorum of the committee in the city.

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman means a quorum on the Democratic side?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; there was not a quorum of the committee on the Democratic side; but committees are made up of Democrats and Republicans and Progressives, and the latter complain loudly enough when they are not given an opportunity to be present, so they should not insist upon objecting when business is to be taken up and they are present. There were three Republicans on that committee who were in the city, but it was a notorious fact that if the committee met they were likely to act in such an unpatriotic manner that it would have been impossible to obtain any report. But there would have been a quorum of the committee, and, if necessary, enough Democrats to make a quorum of the committee here to-morrow to do whatever business would have been necessary.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, it is now after 7 o'clock. The Members of the House have grown tired after the long day's work and have nearly all gone home. Without counting, I do not believe there are more than 25 Members present. It happens, however, that the gentlemen who have spoken since this resolution has been under consideration have taken occasion to say that they were not responsible for the delay in the passage of the appropriation bills. It further happens that each of those gentlemen, I believe, voted against the passage of the Panama Canal tolls repeal bill. One speaker attributes the delay to the Democratic Party, alleging incompetency and inefficiency. To that, of course, nobody gives serious attention. Everybody recognizes and realizes the spirit in which that was said; but it has been more seriously said by another that the delay in the passage of the supply bills has been occasioned by the displacement of those bills with the Panama Canal tolls repeal bill. I for one, and I believe I can also speak for absent Democrats, wish to assume responsibility to the extent that I am able to do it of delaying the passage of the supply bills, in promoting the passage of the Panama Canal tolls repeal bill. If the Panama repeal bill had not been gotten up, and considered and passed when it was, the probabilities are that that statute, iniquitous in my judgment, would still be upon the statute books. It is true that the supply bills have been delayed, but with all their delay not a single account has gone unpaid, not a single salary up to now stands unpaid.

Mr. GILLETT. Men have been discharged.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. We have accomplished the result of the repeal of the Panama tolls bill without having any delay in the payment of a bill or a salary or the discharge of even one man because the appropriation bills have been delayed. The result is better for the whole country than if the supply bills had passed long ago.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I ask to be heard on this.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again admonish Members that this resolution is now being considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole and that the five-minute rule ought therefore to prevail. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] very pleasantly ran along with his speech, and the Chair permitted him to do so, as did the gentleman from New York. The rule, however, is for five minutes.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] that he did deliberately help to hold up the supply bills for the purpose of passing the Panama Canal tolls repeal bill, I wish to say that from my viewpoint, as a Republican, the delay in the passage of these supply bills has been due very largely to Executive interference in the affairs of Congress, as for instance, in the demand for the passage of the Panama Canal tolls repeal bill. We have had antitrust legislation and Panama Canal tolls legislation thrust upon us, and the Democratic majority has been substantially helpless in the matter. It has had to do the bidding of the White House with respect to these important measures in order that the Democratic platform at Baltimore might be carried into effect. We have dallied with the regular business.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, that statement is not correct. Whatever was done here was done by the Democratic Party in the House on its own responsibility, and after full deliberation.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman makes that statement, but will the gentleman say whether his Committee on Appropriations met in the usual way to prepare the supply bills at the usual time?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; it did.

Mr. MOORE. Then why this long delay? It was not because the gentleman did not get his lunch, was it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No.

Mr. MOORE. It was not because sometimes his stomach was out of order, waiting for gentlemen to get over their penchant for demanding a quorum?

Mr. CARLIN. Oh, that is a personal question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It was due somewhat to the fact that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] persisted in taking up what very many of us thought was an unusually large amount of time in the discussion of the bill.

Mr. MOORE. Well, I am quite sure whatever time the gentleman from Pennsylvania took up was as near the point as it was possible to make it, and he was in no way responsible for the raising of points of no quorum during this session of Congress. I believe, with many other Republicans, that the Democratic Party, being in control, it could do substantially as it pleased, and that the obligation was upon it to pass the supply bills, in order that wages should be paid and that the business of the Government might go on. It is rather anomalous that the Committee on Appropriations under a Democratic administration should meet in the usual way as it met during 16 years of Republican administration, and then on each succeeding year after it came into full power still be obliged to ask for an extension of time to get its bills through to pay wages and avoid the confusion to which the gentleman from Massachusetts has referred. I believe it was due not so much to the gentleman from New York and the Appropriations Committee as to an insistence from the White House upon the Democratic majority for the passage of the administration bills. Thus the appropriations were held up and all the ordinary incidental business of the Government was sidetracked. It was a matter of political policy, whether right or wrong, and the Democratic majority yielded to carry out the wishes of those "higher up," who seemed to want to make the Democratic platform effective, whether they violated one of the cardinal planks in reference to the Panama Canal or not.

But I rose, Mr. Speaker, to refer to the rather remarkable statement of the gentleman from New York, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, in arraignment of the alleged extravagance of Republican Congresses. To a certain extent the gentleman from New York has turned tail upon that proposition.

A short time ago, in April, I think, when one of the appropriation bills was up, he made a startling statement in regard to Democratic aggrandizement, and to the Democratic desire to secure more appropriations than any of the Republican administrations have secured.

Now, I have asked for five minutes in order that within that time, even to this very scant attendance of the House, I might refer to at least two unusual speeches, one by the gentleman from New York, the same gentleman from New York who a little while ago undertook to tell us how much Republicans were to blame in the preparation and passage of these important appropriation bills.

Let us first recur to the RECORD of April 7, 1914, and listen to the eloquence of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON], a member of the Committee on Appropriations, of which the gentleman from New York is chairman. We were then discussing the proposition to increase the salaries of clerks to Congressmen, and the gentleman from Mississippi was charging his colleagues with extravagance and appealing to the Republican minority here to save the face of the Congress of the United States. The gentleman from Mississippi began——

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Mississippi never appealed to Republicans for economy.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman says so, but out of the mouth of the gentleman from Mississippi we may be able to contradict the statement. The gentleman from Mississippi said:

> Republicans are always extravagant. They are not to be blamed for extravagance. They do not know any better. But the Democrats know better. They have had better training.

And there was great applause at that. The gentleman from Mississippi continued:

> I said this in a speech before, in the last session; and when I made that speech Members of the Democratic House came to me and asked me not to put it in the RECORD, because it would be used by the Republicans in their campaign book. Let them use it. If they do, it will be by way of confession and avoidance. They can get no consolation out of it, except that we know better. You may use that statement now, gentlemen, because when Democrats get to be so violently extravagant that it makes our record look bad as compared with the very wicked records of the Republicans, I must apologize to you Republicans for having ever used the words "criminally extravagant" in criticizing the appropriations that you made, for if that expression, "criminally extravagant," was proper to apply to you—my God—the English language has never found an adjective strong enough to apply to Democratic extravagance.

And then there was applause on the Republican side. There was much more of this——

Mr. FITZGERALD. He certainly did not appeal in the hope of getting any help from the Republicans.

Mr. MOORE. I now turn to the remarks of the gentleman from New York. I shall quote from the gentleman:

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOORE. I have not the time. In justice to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], I must quote him accurately. If he will give me time to yield, I will do so.

Mr. DONOVAN. I only wanted to ask you to put the date of that speech in the RECORD.

Mr. MOORE. It was April 7, 1914. I will be very glad to put it in the RECORD, because I believe the gentleman from Mississippi stands by that speech.

Now, on April 10, 1914, the gentleman from New York was opposing an effort on the part of certain gentlemen, both Democrats and Republicans, to retain certain assay offices somewhere in the vicinity of their districts. There was a proposition to concentrate them all, and all the employees in the assay service as well, in the city of New York, which the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] so ably represents upon this floor. The gentleman from New York, in his statement that day, said he was not very well; he was not feeling good, and was not of very cheerful demeanor. Perhaps it was one of the days when he was not able to get down to lunch. I know how hard he works, and give him credit for staying here frequently beyond the lunch hour.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am glad the gentleman has given an excuse, if there be any, for the speech he is going to read.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman had a very good excuse. I think he stated it forcibly himself when he said there were times when he stood upon this floor in support of his bills when he knew that there was provender waiting for him downstairs. He stood here with stoical heroism because a sense of duty predominated with him, even as it does with the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN], who remains so faithfully on every occasion. But the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] said:

> Mr. Chairman, it may seem somewhat strange—

This was in opposition to the attempt of gentlemen from other sections of the country to retain the existing assay offices:

> But I hope it is not out of place to remind Members on this side of the House that the Democratic platform pledged us in favor of economy and to the abolishment of useless offices; but it did not declare, Mr. Chairman, that the party favored economy at the expense of Republicans and the abolition of useless offices in territory represented in this House by Republicans while favoring a different doctrine wherever a Democratic Representative would be affected.
> In a few months—

And these words ought to be set down as classics in our political history when any controversy arises as to Republican or Democratic extravagance—

> In a few months—

Said our distinguished friend from New York—

> I shall be called upon in the discharge of my official duties to review the record that this Democratic House shall have made in its authorization of the expenditure of the public moneys. Whenever I think of the horrible mess that I shall be called upon to present to the country on behalf of the Democratic Party—

And there was laughter upon the Republican side—

> I am tempted to quit my place.

Now, I was one of those who held up his hand in protest against the gentleman quitting his place at that time. I felt we needed a strong man like him on guard when these rapacious representatives of his own party were insisting upon looting the Treasury. There he stood, a veritable Ajax defying the Democratic lightning, protecting the entire country—Democrats, Republicans, and Prohibitionists alike, and I will also include the Progressives, whom I temporarily forgot—and I admired him.

> I am tempted to quit my place—

He said—

> I am looking now at Democrats who seem to take amusement in soliciting votes on the floor of this House to overturn the Committee on Appropriations in its efforts to carry out the pledges of the Democratic platform. They seem to take it to be a huge joke not to obey their platform.

I am quite sure there was no covert reference to the White House when the gentleman from New York made that rather prophetic and direct statement—> and to make ridiculous the efforts of the members of our party who do try to live up to the promises they made to the people.

Evidently all Democrats did not then think alike or look alike to the gentleman from New York. But the gentleman from New York had the courage of his convictions. He struck out boldly and told the country what he thought. He made it clear that the Democratic Party was not made up of Puritans, nor was it so entirely self-sacrificing as to yield up everything to the welfare of the country.

I know—

The gentleman from New York asserted—that some Members on this side are voting continually for appropriations because they fear the wrath of the public if they do not vote out of the Public Treasury assistance for everything anyone suggests. I have in my hand a letter which is somewhat characteristic of the correspondence which I receive daily.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for one minute more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for one minute more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE. Interpolating a few asterisks and leaving out some of the things the gentleman from New York said, he came down to this:

We charge the Republicans for 12 years of my service in the House under Republican administrations with being grossly extravagant and reckless in the expenditure of the public money. I believed that charge to be true. I believed that my party, when placed in power, would demonstrate that the charges we had made in good faith were true. We are entitled to the help and to the support of the Members on this side of the House in honest efforts to carry out the pledges of the Democratic Party and in our attempts to show that what we charged in order to get in power was true. We have not had that support. Our Democratic colleagues have not given that support to us thus far during this session of Congress.

Maybe that is the reason why the bills were held up. Perhaps they had not gotten in everything they wanted. I read further:

They have voted against recommendations they should not have voted against. They have unnecessarily piled up the public expenditures until the Democratic Party is becoming the laughing stock of the country.

I appeal to them now before it is too late. I appeal to them now before we have gone beyond recall to stop the conduct of which they have been guilty. Do not continue to vote for these improper and improvident appropriations. Those who propose to continue to do so should at least have the courage openly to assert upon the floor of this House that they believe that the professions of the Democratic Party have not been made in good faith, that they can not be carried out, and that we are not entitled to power because of those professions. [Applause.]

Why, gentlemen, what further or more effective indictment could be made against the statement just uttered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] in answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] than this utterance on April 10 last by the same gentleman from New York, who was then, as now, the chairman of the Democratic Committee on Appropriations? [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bill:

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, July 15, 1914.

The Senate met at 12 o'clock m.

Rev. J. L. Kibler, D. D., of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

Our heavenly Father, we look to Thee for Thy blessing as we enter upon the duties of this day. May these men who watch at the gate of our Nation have Thy laws within their hearts. May they have wisdom and grace to observe Thy statutes. May they magnify Thy name and enjoy Thy constant favor. During this heated term, which tries men's strength, may it please Thee to preserve their lives and health, their going out and their coming in, and in all their plans and deliberations be Thou their guide and their counselor. We ask it in Christ's name. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. THOMAS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I present a petition from the Merchants and Manufacturers' Association of Baltimore, Md., which I ask to have read at the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the petition.

The Secretary proceeded to read the petition, and was interrupted by,

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of opinion that until the rules of the Senate are changed this is not a petition which comes to the Senate in open session. Unless there be an appeal from the Chair, the reading of the petition will cease.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, this petition was received by me through the mails. Under the Constitution of the United States the people of our country have a right to petition Congress for such legislation as they demand. I did not present the petition for the purpose of showing that it meets with my approval, because it does not. I do not share in the opinion that men who are engaged in big business are the only ones who——

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I call for the regular order.

Mr. GRONNA. Petitions of this kind, I want to state——

Mr. SWANSON. When I am in the Senate during the morning hour I am going to call for the regular order. We are wasting time here repeatedly, and it will be utterly impossible to reach a final adjournment of this session of Congress unless the rules of the Senate are enforced. Petitions can be presented as the rule provides, and if it is asked that they be printed in the RECORD I will consent, but I shall in the future call for the regular order when I am in the Senate during the morning hour, and I call for the regular order now.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, if the Senator from Virginia wants to take me off the floor when I present a petition sent to me by a commercial body of one of the great cities of the United States, he may do it, but I want to remind him that I shall probably be here as long as he will be here and that my time will come to make a similar suggestion to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON. I desire to say that in this matter there is no discrimination against the Senator from North Dakota or any other Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. I was proceeding in an orderly manner. I decline to yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order has been called for, and unless there is an appeal from the Chair the petition will be referred to the Senate in executive session.

Mr. GRONNA. That is not satisfactory to me, Mr. President; but I still have the floor, and I want to make a few observations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The presentation of petitions and memorials is in order.

Mr. GRONNA. I have a telegram in the nature of a petition from E. E. Garvin, secretary of Minot Division, Order of Railway Conductors, of Berthold, N. Dak., which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Telegram.]

BERTHOLD, N. DAK., July 14, 1914.

Hon. A. J. GRONNA,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Minot Division, No. 483, Order Railway Conductors of America, honorably solicit your support of the Clayton antitrust bill designed to take labor organizations from under the Sherman antitrust law. We respectfully request your untiring efforts in behalf of its passage before the close of this session of Congress.

E. E. GARVIN, Secretary.

Mr. GRONNA. I have also petitions here, and I will ask to have only one read by the Secretary, and then I ask that they may be properly noted and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection, the petition was read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

A PETITION TO THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

BROCKETT, N. DAK.

Hon. A. J. GRONNA,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We, the undersigned voters, earnestly petition for the passage by the United States Congress of the joint resolution introduced in the House of Representatives December 10, 1913, by Congressman RICHMOND P. HOBSON and on the same day introduced in the Senate by Senator MORRIS SHEPPARD, providing for the prohibition of the sale, manufacture for sale, and exportation for sale of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes in the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof.

Mr. GRONNA presented petitions of sundry citizens of Hansboro, Grafton, and Kintyre, all in the State of North Dakota, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of Local Typographical Union No. 690, of Devils Lake, N. Dak., praying for the enactment of the so-called Clayton antitrust bill, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GRONNA. Day before yesterday I presented several petitions praying for national prohibition, and through inadvertence I overlooked briefing them. I wish to state now that those petitions were from the following towns and cities in the State of North Dakota; Mrs. John McDermid Hamilton, Hamilton voters, Kenmare Methodist Episcopal Church, Westhope mass meeting, Bathgate citizens, Neche voters, Heaton Christian Endeavor and Christian Temperance Union, Elmore mass meeting, Northwood voters, Forbes (80 people), Guelph (100 people), Sheldon mass meeting, Forest River mass meeting (300 people), Grafton mass meeting (300 people), and Hensel meeting of citizens.

The petitions are signed by a great number of voters and citizens of the State of North Dakota. Many of them are personally known to me. They are good business men, and, looking at the question from an economic standpoint as well as from a moral standpoint, they believe in having this amendment to the Constitution passed.

We are fortunate in my State, Mr. President. We have no large cities. We are a rural population, and the people of my State think for themselves. We do not think it is necessary to select for high positions men whose ambition and whose entire life has been spent for the very purpose of making money either for themselves or for great corporations.

So, Mr. President, I say that our people feel that they have the right to express their views, and they also have a high regard for the opinion of the common people of this country. There are thousands of men outside of the so-called big business who possess the genius, the skill, and the intelligence to do justice to business, but they also are in sympathy with the idea that honest business must be done and that the common everyday man must be taken care of just as well as those who are engaged in big business if we are going to have substantial prosperity.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona presented petitions of sundry citizens of Tempe, Williams, and Tucson, all in the State of Arizona, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Crown King, Tucson, and Phoenix, all in the State of Arizona, remonstrating against national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of Local Lodge No. 477, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, of Winslow, Ariz., praying for the enactment of the so-called Clayton antitrust bill, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CATRON presented resolutions adopted at a union meeting of churches in Lakewood, N. Mex., favoring national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented memorials of sundry citizens of Texas, remonstrating against national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Texas, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens and churches of the State of West Virginia, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PAGE presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Unions of Rochester and Barton and Bennington County, in the State of Vermont, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution granting the right of suffrage to women, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Michigan, remonstrating against national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Ironwood, Mich., remonstrating against any change being made in the American flag, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of sundry labor organizations of the State of Michigan, praying for the enactment of the so-called antitrust legislation, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Bad Axe and Detroit, in the State of Michigan, remonstrating against the proposed increase in the number of chaplains in the United States Navy, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented petitions of sundry labor organizations of the State of Michigan, praying for the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which were ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, from the Committee on Claims, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 13965) to refund to the Sparrow Gravely Tobacco Co. the sum of $176.99, the same having been erroneously paid by them to the Government of the United States (Rept. No. 669); and

A bill (H. R. 14679) for the relief of Clarence L. George (Rept. No. 668).

SULPHUR RIVER BRIDGE, TEXAS.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably with an amendment the bill (S. 6031) authorizing the Board of Trade of Texarkana, Ark.-Tex., to construct a bridge across Sulphur River at or near Pace's ferry, between the counties of Bowie and Cass, in the State of Texas, and I submit a report (No. 666) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in line 5, after the name "Sulphur River," to insert "at a point suitable to the interest of navigation," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Board of Trade of Texarkana, Ark.-Tex., to build, maintain, and operate a public highway bridge across the Sulphur River, at a point suitable to the interest of navigation, at or near Pace's ferry, between the counties of Bowie and Cass, in the State of Texas, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906."

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUPPRESSION OF CORRUPT PRACTICES.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I introduce a bill for reference.

The bill (S. 6103) to suppress graft and prevent corruption by prohibiting certain relations of Members of Congress, Resident Commissioners, members of the Cabinet, Federal judges and justices, and other Federal officers with certain individuals, firms, corporations, companies, and associations, and prescribing penalties, was read the first time by its title.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask that the bill be read. The title is rather startling.

The bill was read the second time at length, as follows:

A bill (S. 6103) to suppress graft and prevent corruption by prohibiting certain relations of Members of Congress, Resident Commissioners, members of the Cabinet, Federal judges and justices, and other Federal officers with certain individuals, firms, corporations, companies, and associations, and prescribing penalties.

Whereas the first obligation of a public servant is to the people; and

Whereas the proper discharge of official duties requires that public servants shall have no relations with corporate or other interests that might conflict with an unselfish devotion to the common good; and

Whereas relations and entanglements tending to lead public men astray should be prevented as far as possible by proper laws and penalties: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That whoever, being elected or appointed a Member of or Delegate to Congress, or a Resident Commissioner, or being appointed a judge or justice of any court of the United States, or marshal thereof, or a member of the Cabinet of the President of the United States, or to any other office under the Government of the United States, shall, after his election, nomination for election, or appointment, and either before or after he has qualified and during his continuance in office, directly or indirectly, asks, accepts, receives or agrees to receive, without adequate and legitimate consideration, any money, property, transportation of person or property, frank, franking privilege, contract, undertaking, obligation, gratuity, security for the payment of money or for the delivery or conveyance of anything of value to him or to any person with his consent, connivance, or concurrence, or other thing of value, or any promise of any money, property, transportation of person or property, frank, franking privilege, undertaking, obligation, gratuity, security for the payment of money or for the delivery or conveyance of anything of value to him or to any person with his consent, connivance, or concurrence, or other thing of value, from any railroad, sleeping-car, dining-car, ship, steamboat, express, telegraph, or telephone company, or from any individual, firm, association, company, or corporation under indictment for or acting in violation of the antitrust laws of the United States or of any State, or that has been officially shown to have violated any of the antitrust laws of the United States or of any State, or from any firm, corporation, person, officer, or agent acting for or in the interest of the individuals, firms, associations, corporations, or companies hereinbefore mentioned, shall be punished by fine of not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, and may also be adjudged to have forfeited his office or place, and furthermore may be adjudged to be forever disqualified from holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the Government of the United States, and the burden of proof to show that adequate and legitimate consideration has been given for the things herein mentioned shall rest upon the official who has asked or accepted, received or agreed to receive them. By the words "adequate and legitimate consideration" is meant by such consideration as usually obtains in the course of ordinary business transactions.

SEC. 2. That whoever, being elected or appointed a Member or Delegate to Congress, or a Resident Commissioner, or being appointed a judge or justice of any court of the United States, or marshal thereof, or a member of the Cabinet of the President the the United States, or to any other office under the Government of the United States shall, after his election, nomination for election, or appointment, and either before or after he has qualified and during his continuance in office, directly or indirectly, asks, accepts, receives, or agrees to receive any loan of money or property or of any other thing of value, or any promise of any loan of money or property or of any other thing of value, from any railroad, sleeping-car, dining-car, ship, steamboat, express, telegraph, or telephone company, or from any individual, firm, association, company, or corporation under indictment for or acting in violation of the antitrust laws of the United States or of any State, or that has been officially shown to have violated any of the antitrust laws of the United States or of any State, or from any firm, corporation, person, officer, or agent acting for or in the interest of the individuals, firms, associations, corporations, or companies hereinbefore mentioned, shall be punished by fine of not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, and may also be adjudged to have forfeited his office or place, and furthermore may be adjudged to be forever disqualified from holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the Government of the United States.

SEC. 3. That whoever, being elected or appointed a Member of or Delegate to Congress, or a Resident Commissioner, or being appointed a judge or justice of any court of the United States or marshal thereof, or a member of the Cabinet of the President of the United States, or to any other office under the Government of the United States, shall after his election, nomination for election, or appointment, and either before or after he has qualified and during his continuance in office, directly or indirectly, asks, accepts, takes, or agrees to take any office or employment, or remuneration for the performance of any office or employment, from any railroad, sleeping-car, dining-car, ship, steamboat, express, telegraph, or telephone company, or from any person, firm, association, company, or corporation under indictment for or acting in violation of the antitrust laws of the United States or of any State, or that has been officially shown to have violated any of the antitrust laws of the United States or of any State, or from any firm, corporation, person, officer, or agent acting for or in the interest of the individuals, firms, associations, corporations, or companies hereinbefore mentioned, shall be punished by fine of not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, and may also be adjudged to be forever disqualified from holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the Government of the United States.

SEC. 4. That nothing in this act shall be construed to apply to religious, charitable, or other benevolent organizations not conducted for pecuniary profit.

SEC. 5. That any firm, association, individual, company, or corporation hereinbefore mentioned, tendering or promising to tender, giving or promising to give, the things described in this act to the officials hereinbefore described, before or after qualifying for office, shall be punished by a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, and may also be barred from interstate commerce; and the said individual may also be imprisoned for not more than five years, and may also be adjudged to have forfeited any office or place he may hold under the United States, and, furthermore, may be adjudged to be forever disqualified from holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the Government of the United States.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What is this document?

The VICE PRESIDENT. A bill introduced by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] and read at the request of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], and it is now about to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think it had better be referred to the Federal trade commission.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENTS TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. O'GORMAN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,000 to pay Frank Oliver for extra services as clerk to the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals, intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMOOT submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $5,000 for aid to the Library for the Blind, located at 1729 H Street NW., Washington, D. C., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

Mr. McCUMBER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

THE PLATTSBURGH MEMORIALS.

Mr. SAULSBURY submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 27), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Whereas the Government of the United States has provided for the erection of memorials at or near Plattsburgh, N. Y., in commemoration of Commodore Thomas Macdonough's victory on Lake Champlain in September, 1814, and commissions have been appointed by the States of Vermont and New York, as well as a commission to be appointed by the President of the United States, which are to have in charge the erection of such memorials and the suitable commemoration of said victory: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a committee of 10 members be appointed, 5 by the President of the Senate and 5 by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to represent the Congress of the United States to attend said ceremonies, and authority is hereby given to expend $250 from the contingent fund of the Senate and $250 from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives to defray the expenses of said committee upon vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate and the Committee on Accounts of the House of Representatives, respectively.

AFFAIRS IN MEXICO.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I submit a resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 419) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy is requested to inform the Senate as to the truth or falsity of the press report sent out from Vera Cruz, Mexico, June 17, 1914, and published in the United States, that an ensign in the United States Navy caused to be shot unarmed Mexican prisoners under the so-called Mexican "ley de fuga"; and to inform the Senate of all the circumstances relating to said act, if it occurred.

Mr. KERN. I ask that the resolution may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I wish to inquire if there was objection to the present consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There was. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] asked that the resolution go over.

EXEMPTIONS FROM CIVIL-SERVICE LAWS.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 418), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment is hereby directed to collate and report to the Senate the number of employees included in the acts of the Sixty-third Congress approved to date who have been exempted from the provisions of the civil-service laws, and also the number who have been exempted during that period by Executive order, giving in each case the duties and salary of the incumbent.

NEW YORK, NEW HAVEN & HARTFORD RAILROAD (S. DOC. NO. 544).

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, day before yesterday the Senate had before it the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission, in which they submitted to the Senate evidence that had been taken under a resolution passed by the Senate, and the same was ordered to be printed in connection with their report as a Senate document. The demand for the evidence will not be so very great, but the demand for the report is great, and I wish to ask now that the report be printed separately. In order that the Secretary may have a proper record of it, I send to the desk and ask for the adoption of the following order.

The order was read, as follows:

Ordered, That 10,000 copies of the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission submitted to the Senate on July 13, 1914, relative to the financial transactions of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co., be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator from Nebraska if he has learned what the printing of 10,000 copies will cost?

Mr. NORRIS. I have learned that it will cost much less than the limit that would compel us to pass a concurrent resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. Much less than $500?

Mr. NORRIS. The document will be somewhat larger than the pamphlet I have in my hand, which has 101 pages. It is already in type, of course, and the only expense will be the cost of the paper and the ink and the small amount of labor that will be necessary to print it.

Mr. SMOOT. Evidently if it is to contain only 101 pages, it will come within the limit.

Mr. NORRIS. It will not come anywhere near the limit. I have had the estimate of the Public Printer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is agreed to.

VOTES ON TARIFF LAW OF 1913.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have in my hand a statement prepared in the office of the Secretary of the Senate relative to the yea-and-nay votes of the Senate during the consideration of the tariff bill of 1913. I ask that it may be printed as a document.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What is the document?

Mr. SIMMONS. It is a statement prepared in the office of the Secretary of the Senate of the yea-and-nay votes on the tariff bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is, upon each schedule or upon the final passage of the bill?

Mr. SIMMONS. Upon all the schedules of the bill; all the votes that were taken.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BURTON. I presume it will be practically the same as the document published in regard to the votes on the tariff bill of 1909.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; which was prepared by the late Senator Bacon. I have not examined it carefully, but I understand that that is the line it follows. It simply gives the yea-and-nay votes, without any comments at all.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish to ask the Senator from North Carolina how many copies each Senator would have if it is simply printed as a public document and nothing more said? Would it give us more than two or three copies?

Mr. SIMMONS. I think that would be a matter for the Committee on Printing. I suppose the request will be referred to the Committee on Printing, and it would report it back.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is my impression if it is simply printed as a public document under some regulation, we would have only a few copies each.

Mr. SMOOT. Each Senator would have two.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Each Senator would have two. It seems to me that while it is being set up in print it would cost very little more to have enough copies printed so that each Senator can be liberally supplied. I should like to have quite a number. I hope the Committee on Printing will provide that enough copies shall be printed.

Mr. SIMMONS. I had supposed that under the rule the motion would go to the Committee on Printing, and they would recommend the number of copies that it was thought expedient to print.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should like to move an amendment, if it is in order, that it go to the Committee on Printing with instructions that if they report favorably, they shall provide enough copies so that each Senator may have, say, 25.

Mr. SIMMONS. What number does the Senator suggest?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I would be satisfied with 25 copies; but I do not know how that would strike others. Two copies would not be of much use to me.

Mr. SIMMONS. I suggest that instead of 25 copies each Senator be given 50 copies.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Whatever number the Senator thinks best.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to make an inquiry. I think this is knowledge the Senate ought to have, but from what inquiry I have been able to make, when a document is ordered printed as a Senate document it gives to each Senator about two copies, while as a matter of practice, I think, when they are not called for the clerks in charge, after waiting a reasonable length of time, will often supply an additional number of copies to those who desire them. Sometimes a document is printed and there are only a few Senators who desire copies of it. It seems to me, if that is correct, the Committee on Printing has no jurisdiction whatever, unless the resolution provides that additional copies must be printed, and if it provides that additional copies shall be printed for the use of the Senate, then all the additional copies will be distributed among the Members of the Senate. But as I understand it, and I should like to be informed if I am not right, the printing of a document will mean the printing of between 1,600 and 1,700 copies, and under the law they are divided up among the House and Senate and the departments and other officials of the Government and public libraries, so that there are only about 2 copies left for each Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the Senator from Nebraska know that there will be any great call for copies of the tariff votes?

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no; I am not speaking of this document in particular. I wanted to know whether I am right about the number.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. A little later in the fall it might be very desirable to have the specific votes of Senators on that unfortunate measure, and I hope the Senator will press the matter, that the country may not be deprived of accurate information as to who voted for the present tariff law and who did not.

Mr. NORRIS. I think so. I think there ought to be additional copies. If it goes to the Committee on Printing, the committee can easily remedy it by a resolution providing that it shall be printed as a Senate document and a certain number of additional copies shall be printed for the use of the Senate. That would mean that all the additional copies would be divided up among the Members of the Senate, and of course it would give them a much larger number.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that whenever a document is printed as a public document there is one copy sent to each of the libraries of the country; there are so many allowed to the House, so many allowed to the Senate, and so many allowed to each of the departments, which amounts, of course, in round numbers, to the number of copies the Senator stated. If the Committee on Printing reports favorably upon printing this as a public document, in the same resolution it can provide that a certain number be printed for the use of the document room. The documents which are printed for the use of the document room are not allotted to each Senator, but they are given to Senators as called for. Of the original number printed as public documents each Senator is allowed a certain quota.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah inform me if a certain number of extra copies of a public document are printed for the document room and are liable to be all given out to the Senator who first applies for them, would it not be wiser that these 5,000 or 10,000 extra copies of this document be printed for the use of the Senate, so that they will be distributed equally amongst Senators?

Mr. SMOOT. In that case we would have reported the resolution that so many copies be printed for the folding room. When they go to the folding room each Senator is credited with his share of the number.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is what I should like to see done.

Mr. SMOOT. When they go to the document room they are distributed from the document room as called for.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I should like to ask whether this statement, when published, will include the votes in the House of Representatives as well as in the Senate?

Mr. SIMMONS. I think not, Mr. President. It was prepared under the direction of the Secretary of the Senate, and covers only, I think, the yea-and-nay votes taken in the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. The yea-and-nay votes in the House would only amount to one or two, I think.

Mr. WORKS. Whatever votes were taken could be disclosed, and I think they should be included in the document.

Mr. SIMMONS. That would probably require the joint action of the two Houses.

Mr. WORKS. It might be that joint action would be required; but it seems to me it would be a very desirable thing that the statement should show the votes of the two Houses.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The statement will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

PEND OREILLE RIVER DAM.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, on the 29th day of July, 1913, the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior granted a permit to the International Power & Manufacturing Co. for the use of the public land in connection with the building of a dam across the Pend Oreille River. Knowing that for some reason this project had not been financed, I wrote to the gentleman who has charge of it, asking for facts and information with reference to the matter. I have here his letter, which gives some very valuable suggestions with reference to the important questions relating to the water-power legislation. I ask that the letter may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands, which is considering this matter.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have your favor of June 24 in regard to the legislation before Congress concerning the development of water powers on the public lands, and requesting information regarding the value of that certain permit issued to the International Power & Manufacturing Co. by the Secretaries of Interior and Agriculture on the 29th day of July, 1913, which permit is printed as a public document, being Senate Document No. 147, Sixty-third Congress, first session; also my opinion of Senate bill 4415 and House bill 16673, Union Calendar 258.

I will answer your inquiries as briefly as possible, but the unique position of the project sought to be developed by the International Power & Development Co., its competitive surroundings, the limitations of its markets, and the disposition of corporations throughout the United States engaged in water-power development to discourage construction of water-power projects under this character of permit, makes it necessary to cover the subject at some length that you may understand the problems that confront an independent developer of water-power projects, especially in a field which can be reached by established plants, and that you can render such assistance, through congressional legislation, as will be beneficial to the public, a protection to capital who desire to invest in these enterprises, and at the same time lend encouragement to the individual or corporate effort and energy required to initiate and complete such an undertaking.

The power site of the International Power & Manufacturing Co. is located on the Pend Oreille River, in Pend Oreille County, Wash., about 90 miles north of Spokane. The immediate surrounding country is very mountainous and is sparsely settled. There are but few small towns or villages, and these so far have developed little use for electric light and power. The mountains are, however, covered with a heavy growth of timber, a large percentage of which is valuable for pulp manufacturing, and there are also large deposits of high-grade lime, clay, silica, iron, lead, zinc, and copper in a country contributary to the site. All these resources are practically undeveloped and offer an opportunity to capital to establish some very large manufacturing industries if cheap power can be obtained for operative and treatment purposes, as there is no coal found in that locality. Cheap power is an absolute necessity to this general development to meet the prevailing high freight rates to a profitable market for the manufactured goods, and as nature has created a possible power development at the site selected which engineers have examined and proclaimed the cheapest development per horse power in the United States, I have every reason to believe, all things being equally adjusted, it will be only a short time until this can be accomplished and the site be made the center of one of the largest and most beneficial and profitable industrial sections of the United States.

The present power development in western Montana, northern Idaho, and eastern Washington, in which territory the site is situated, is controlled as follows:

The Washington Water Power Co., with its principal office at Spokane, Wash., transmits its power to Newport, Wash., about 65 miles south of the power site of the International Power & Manufacturing Co., where it supplies power to the North Idaho & Montana Power Co., a corporation affiliated with H. M. Byllesby & Co., of Chicago, and under their management and control. The North Idaho & Montana Power Co. distribute this power and control the lighting franchises in a number of towns along the Great Northern Railroad in Washington, Idaho, and Montana. The Washington Water Power Co., from their numerous plants on the Spokane River, distribute power to the Coeur d'Alene mining district to the east, the city of Moscow, Idaho, on the south, and the cities of Lind and Wilson Creek, Wash., on the west. They own the franchises in all the cities of any size in this territory, and are in a position to connect up and supply any intermediate or new development.

The Montana Power Co. covers practically all of Montana, and from their Thompson Falls plant, now building, can cover the Coeur d'Alene country and much of the territory controlled by the Washington Water Power Co., if they so desire.

To the west of the Washington Water Power Co. is the territory served by the Pacific Power & Light Co., a corporation controlled by the American Power & Light Co.

All these corporations are identified both commercially and financially with the large power interests of the United States. Many of their directors are directors, stockholders, and officers in large power companies affiliated with large hydroelectrical and electrical manufactories, and many of them are connected with strong financial houses, while caring for the financial requirements of these companies will lend no assistance to competitive companies and do everything possible to discourage others from so doing.

On the Kootenai River in southern British Columbia are the plants of the Kootenai Power Co., which supplies power to within 60 miles of the power site of the International Power & Manufacturing Co. on the north and west.

You can therefore appreciate that the possibility of supplying any considerable amount of power for public-utility purposes by the International Power & Manufacturing Co. at this time is very slight, and the use for its power can only be found in establishing manufactories and selling their power at low rates. This fact was clearly established and understood by the Secretaries of Interior and Agriculture at the time the permit was issued, and as far as they could under the law the permit was blended to assist such development. How far the low price at which this power is capable of per horsepower development, and consequently the low price at which it can be sold, thereby affecting the rates for power and light now made by competitive companies of the community, has affected the financing of the project is an unsettled question, and whether the objection offered to this permit by the large power interests all over the United States affiliated in sentiment, if not in dollars, is due to a desire to prevent the development and control of any power project, under any permit, which contains the public-participating features of this permit, is a fact that perhaps will never be admitted. But whether it is or is not admitted, it is an established fact that men connected with the competitive power companies of the community have on every occasion and at every place where financial assistance might be rendered the enterprise belittled the permit, endeavored to discredit its workings, and sought in every way to have the public, and bankers in particular, believe that the permit lacked any substantial value in any way to the development of the project, and in fact was injurious to its financial benefit.

Not only has this been done, but representatives have been employed and maintained at Washington to circulate the same statements, and at the same time urge water-power legislation along lines that I believe would intrench the water-power trusts or aggregations now in control of the water-power development of the United States in a firmer hold on all the water-power developments of the country. These are the attacks that every independent power developer must meet to-day, and if he is to be sustained in his efforts the legislation you enact must be such as will bend to meet the unjust and artificial obstacles that are raised to prevent the consummation of his plans. Otherwise all the power development of the country must be completed by the present combination of electrical manufacturers and their financial associates, who at present control such a large percentage of the developed water powers of the United States, or the Government must develop them for the benefit of the country.

With this preliminary statement, I will now take up your letter regarding the permit.

From the standpoint of securing a valuable franchise from the Government, a part of the value of which should be returned to the public, I consider the permit good with the following modification: The permit should be indeterminate as to time and irrevocable except for breach of conditions, with a provision that the United States can take over the property at any time on the payment of the value of the plant, the same to be determined by arbitration or through the usual legal channels. The desirability of this change in the permit is recognized by everyone. So far as it was possible to go under existing laws at the time the permit was issued this was done. The most serious objection I have had to the permit, from capital, has been to this feature. In an enterprise of this character, entering on a new field, confined to a sale of power almost exclusively for manufacturing purposes, every element of permanency should be made to the permit that capital can more easily be secured and at the lowest possible cost. Under the present permit one is subjected to the whims and fancies of the Secretaries of Interior and Agriculture, and while I have no complaint to make of Secretary Lane or Secretary Houston, who have rendered every attention, courtesy, and consideration in an effort to arrive at a solution of the problems surrounding water-power development on public lands in a manner beneficial to the public, to capital and the permittee, a change in these offices might also bring a change in policy. That at least is the expressed fear of capital.

There are other features of the permit, I believe, could be changed without loss to the public and at the same time make the permit easier to finance. The suggestions I make are old to the departments, as I made them at the time the permit was issued. At that time my suggestions were rejected, and I accepted the permit, believing its provisions were the stepping-stones to a closer understanding and relationship between the departments and the permittee, and that the former would be as willing to correct a provision of the permit that was later demonstrated to be detrimental to the success of the permittee as the permittee would be to suggest it. And I felt that many of what I termed the inequalities of the permit would eventually be changed by the department when the permittee had established a development managed on the lines of the permit and a spirit of public benefit coupled with it for private or corporate benefit and demonstrated the provisions were impractical.

Section 8, page 6, of the permit provided a rental charge based on the estimated capacity of the plant taken from the flow of the streams. In the application of this schedule of charges the departments were endeavoring to insure to the public the maximum development of the stream and a minimum charge to consumers. I have no objection to this purpose, but the hardship imposed on the permittee is to follow the power or light charges to the ultimate consumer. This will, in my judgment, compel water-power companies to go into the distribution of the power generated to the ultimate consumer, whereas this might be done to better advantage by corporations organized locally.

It seems to me the permittee should be only responsible for the reasonableness of the charge made at its plant or off its own distribution line. That, if it sold power to a distributing company at a price which the departments or a public-utility commission of a State considered fair, the price charged by the distributing company should be regulated by the same bodies. The question of the cost of production could in that manner be segregated from the cost of distribution and it would be easier to work out regulations in a manner fair to everyone on this basis than under the terms of the permit, where the permittee is charged with the duty.

Again, I feel the rental charges should not be revised every 10 years, unless the revision would be downward. My reason is this: The power development of the West must hereafter be used largely for manufacturing and irrigation purposes. To establish manufacturing plants in the West one must be able to assure the manufacturers that his power costs can be depended on for long periods of time. Manufacturing enterprises of the East are based on long life and in many cases running through several generations. The attraction of western manufacturing development is cheap raw material, with plenty of cheap power, but the price of the latter must be fixed and determined and should decrease in cost as the quantity used increases. The average power plant can show a very material reduction on the price for power when the full capacity of the plant is sold, from the price made with the initial development, which must be based on the use of a part of the capacity of the plant.

Section 9 provides for charges on the estimated capacity of the plant. I would suggest that the fairest method of calculation would be in the amount of power generated and sold. If the permittee builds his dam on the stream the full heights the physical features of the stream permit, that should constitute a full development instead of the installation of the machinery to develop the full power of the stream flow. If the permittee installs machinery and offers the power generated to the public at prices approved by the departments or the public-service commission of the State, or both, he has done all he should be required to do, and he should pay his rental on the power he generates and sells rather than on the capacity of the plant. No one will be more interested in selling all the power generated and installing machinery to the full development of his plant as fast as he can sell it, because he can sell the full development at a less price per horsepower and make a greater profit than he can to sell a part of his development at a higher price. He should be compelled to install such measuring devices as will disclose the amount he makes and sells, and his records and books should be open at all times to the departments or commission having supervision over him. Such a plan would provide a rental on actual power produced and sold, and not on estimated capacity.

I have no objection to the supervisory terms of the permit or its provisions against combinations. In view of supervision and regulations of all public utilities by public-service commissions in nearly all the States, and as we have such a commission in this State, which is eminently fair to all interests, I can not agree that the permit is unworkable and believe if difficulties of its operation are disclosed they can all be adjusted in a conference with the departments. So far as my own experience is concerned, with both the Departments of Interior, Agriculture, and War, and the various bureaus of the same, with which my permit was negotiated, there was displayed a disposition only to arrive at a solution of the problems of the International Power & Manufacturing Co. and helpfulness to the enterprise, and I do not flatter myself that I secured any consideration reserved from others. In many elements of the permit they could not agree with me, in others they did, and I am of the opinion if capital and individuals interested in water-power development in the United States would be willing to sit in with these gentlemen and as earnestly endeavor to reach a common ground in these matters that would be fair and equitable to everybody concerned as they are willing to herald broadcast all over the country their autocratic mandates that these matters can not be financed unless it is done in a manner approved only by them, whatever differences exist would be speedily adjusted and the water wheels of progress would be turning all over the country.

Replying to your inquiries—

(a) Have you succeeded in securing funds for development purposes?

I have not definitely succeeded in securing funds for development of the project. I am negotiating with people who I believe will ultimately furnish the money.

(b) In case you have been successful, what, in general, were the terms under which you secured the former?

Not having secured the capital, I can not give you the terms. So far the terms considered have been a bond issue to cover cost of plant, with a large part of the capital stock to cover cost of underwriting.

(c) How many unsuccessful attempts did you make to secure development capital?

I have made six attempts, so far, to secure capital. Most of these led ultimately to the same source or fountainhead of money for hydroelectric development. The independent developer sooner or later must find out that the circle of financial operators in the United States who handle hydroelectric securities is very small and has many wires leading out from the one center through many channels to control as well as censor developments.

(d) What was the nature of the objections raised by those who refused to cooperate with you?

The objections to the permit were various. (1) That there were sufficient plants now operating in this territory; (2) that we should wait until the Washington Water Power Co. had developed business to take over the site; (3) that capital was not going into new enterprises until general business was more steady; (4) that the revocable features of the permit made the development unstable; (5) that the time was not opportune for this development; (6) lack of markets.

(e) What, in your opinion, are the defects in the Pend Oreille permit?

I regard the defect in the permit is its revocable features. As this power must be sold in large units for manufacturing purposes, and it can be developed and power sold with a profit at a lower cost than now prevails in this community, I do not consider the other features of the permit unworkable. I believe the departments will modify them to suit the conditions that arise. I also believe the other changes I have suggested, if granted, would enable me to finance the project on a better basis, and I can not see wherein the changes suggested are injurious to the public.

I am of the opinion, Senator, that the difficulty with the permit is the objection of large power interests to accept its principles, and that these objections are of the mind rather than to the efficiency of the permit. As you inclose me S. 4415 and H. R. 16673, Union Calendar 258, I am taking the liberty to present my views of the same. I believe the administration, Secretary Lane, and yourself are actuated in an earnest desire to enact legislation that will insure development of water power in the United States under suitable national control, protecting the public interest, and in a manner satisfactory to capital. You know ever since I came to the State, in 1892, I have earnestly endeavored, with some degree of success, to help the settler grow his "two blades of grass where none or only one grew before," and now that the agricultural development of our State is along diversified rather than settlement lines, and the ways are open to the next step of progress, or its industrial development, which can only be done by the harnessing of our water powers, I am going to impose on your good nature a little longer to discuss these bills and give you some facts that may assist you in bringing about constructive legislation.

The great objection I have to both these bills is the 50-year limit of the permit. As the greatest use for power must be along manufacturing lines, and the development of water power must carry with it the building of factories coincident to the development of the plant, to insure earnings to pay the fixed charges of the undertaking, and as manufacturers should have an indeterminate period of operation, the power company should be able to make, if necessary, a contract for power running over a period of 100 years without any change in the contract, unless it is a sliding scale of reduction.

I presume that both these bills are aimed to pacify those people who believe the Government should have a large revenue from developed water powers on public lands. These people have always limited the franchise to 50 years without any apparent reason for that particular period of time. My idea of water-power development is one of sufficient charge by the Government to pay for the supervision of the construction of the plant and the regulation of its operation—a regulation that will insure to capital a fair return on the money and effort invested in the plant and insuring to the public rates that would offer an opportunity to communities to employ labor and furnish all the comforts to humanity that electricity will supply. This, in my judgment, is the function of the Government as applied to water power on public lands, and whatever legislation it is necessary to enact to produce this result should be enacted, and I know nothing that will assist in inducing manufacturers to locate in the West as an assurance that their power can be depended upon. If the contract must be limited to 50 years, then one-fiftieth of the power plant, together with one-fiftieth of the cost of each manufacturing plant constructed to use the power, must be charged off annually, and this will become a charge which the consumer of energy and manufactured goods must pay. If the permit runs indefinitely, this will not be necessary.

Personally I care not how restrictive the permit may be as to supervision of rates or regulation as to combinations, nor have I any objection to the condemnation of the plant at any time, through the proper channels, provided the equity of the owners is considered and the capital invested protected. These things I feel are of much less concern to the permittee if he wants to do the right thing and affect him less in making a market for his energy than does the limitation of the term of the permit, especially if he is up against a manufacturing use for his power. I would therefore urge that the permit or lease be made indeterminate and the public safeguarded against extortion and rapacity in other ways.

The provision of Senate bill 4415 as to appraising the power site and and the payment of a rental of 5 per cent on the approved value. This is a rental, and I can not see much difference than paying it on the capacity of the plant, and the value of the land for power purposes would in all probability creep in. A small charge on the power produced and sold would, I think, be preferable and more easy to adjust.

I see no reason to change my view expressed in the conferences I had a year ago—that the great trouble of water-power development was the uncertainty of the political and economic agitation, and that, inasmuch as the National Government has become and will continue to be a factor in water-power development, I should like to see a bureau established in the Interior Department where the supervision and regulation would center, and which bureau would become a clearing house for all water-power problems. Every water-power development possesses individual surroundings. No two are alike, and they must be governed accordingly This bureau should analyze all proposed power development and encourage in every way its construction. It should encourage the confidence of individuals and corporations. The costs of plants and lines of distribution should be kept, that the experiences in one plant might be a guide to another. In time I assume such a careful system would be established, that the approval of plans and costs would become a valuable assistance in the flotation of securities to complete the plant, and a large saving be made in promotion costs that would inure to the benefit of the public. And in the end it would aid in taking water-power securities out of the realm of electrical manufacturing concerns, the association of which at the present time is tending to a water-power monopoly. With a bureau administered by a fair-minded man, under the supervision of the Secretary of Interior, I can see where great good can be done, with an appropriation to properly equip and maintain it.

I have always been a State rights man, and have felt that the Government should have nothing to do with water-power development, but my experience on the Klickitat River convinces me of the danger of an absolute State right control and the ability of large power interests to combine for their collective advantage thereunder.

My old firm owned the land for 7 miles on both banks of the Klickitat River, from its mouth up the stream, and part of the land on both banks an additional 6 miles up the stream. This being riparian land under the laws of the State, we owned the sole right to use the waters of river where we owned the land on both banks, and had under contemplation the development of a large power plant, to be used in the development of the country between the White Salmon and Klickitat Rivers as far back as Mount Adams. During the 1912 session of the Washington State Legislature Judge Carrol B. Graves, of Seattle, caused to be presented a senate bill, No. 185, "to prevent the use of waters within the State for purposes of use in any other State." The primary object of the bill was to prevent the generation of power within the State and use it in any other State. The real object was to destroy the power value of the Klickitat River, so that they might pass a water code, then before the legislature, which would permit the appropriation of the water of the Klickitat River if it was not developed for water power. The bill was so drastic and so affected all the power companies of the State that representatives of the Washington Water Power Co., Stone & Webster, the Pacific Power & Light all met with myself at Olympia, and considered the bill so destructive, unconstitutional, and iniquitous that we agreed to stand together and defeat it, and met before the committee on Friday for that purpose. We presented such a strong line of argument that the matter went over until Monday for another hearing. During the interim Judge Graves met all the representatives at Seattle, except myself, and they agreed to withdraw the bill and present senate bill 319, with provisions the same as the other, except bill 319 was confined to intrastate waters and excepted all plants constructed March 1, 1913. These provisions excepted every one of the power companies represented, and the power companies assented to this action, and the bill was presented. I was left to fight my own battle against the iniquity of the bill and defeated it. I am therefore forced through experience to conclude that these power companies have little consideration for equity or justice or the rights of others, nor do they care how vicious a measure they support so long as they are excepted from its measures.

Hence I conclude that a water power bureau administered along equitable lines, under the supervision of a higher authority, open at all times to consider all sides and conditions surrounding the development of the project, offers safety and assistance to an independent developer he can secure in no other manner. I believe any man of sufficient caliber to fill the office of Secretary of the Interior is competent to pass on the matter finally, and after a few years the data secured by such a bureau would develop such knowledge as would guide almost any water-power development to ultimate success.

Under such a permit as the International Power & Manufacturing Co. the minimum rental required is less than interest on the investment necessary to acquire the flowage rights measured by the average fee-simple owned plant in this State. I think the maximum rentals are high, but believe experience will reduce these as the circumstances warrant.

The two bills seem to me to have so many features alike that I approve, and the features I disapprove are in both, that I hope there will be united action in producing a beneficial bill. House bill 16673 seems to go a long way toward the bureau idea, but I do not know enough about departmental procedure to conclude if it gives the Secretary of Interior power to create such a bureau; and if it does not I would like to see this brought about and an appropriation made to support it, and the income received from rentals divided as section 8 of that bill provides, after deducting the cost of administration of the bureau.

There is such a field for manufacturing in this western country, with its cheap, undeveloped resources, the healthful and beneficent climate for operators, that I long to see the day when power development is one of economic progress rather than exploitation, and I believe this can be brought about through a National Government in conjunction with the States than in any other way. I trust you may find some thought herein that may aid you.

In view of the kindly treatment I received from the departments, I inclose you two copies. If you use any of this matter will you kindly furnish one copy to the Department of Interior and one to the Department of Agriculture that they may be advised of my views as expressed herein.

Yours, sincerely, RUBEN S. YEARSLEY.

THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published as a Senate document a number of articles and addresses by Judge Robert S. Taylor, of Indiana, a member of the Mississippi River Commission. We shall very soon have before us an important discussion on the Mississippi River, and these articles, I think, will prove a very valuable addition to the literature on the subject.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the matter be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. RANSDELL. I have no objection to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The articles and addresses will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I should like to make one inquiry about these addressses by Judge Taylor. Is there included in the list the hearing before the Senate Committee on Commerce, perhaps two years ago?

Mr. RANSDELL. Yes, sir; that is included; also the hearings before a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Commerce of January 20, 1914; also an article on "The subjugation of the Mississippi River"; also an address delivered in New Orleans, La., on October 27, 1903; a bulletin on "The present aspect of the Mississippi River problem"; a bulletin issued in 1908 and reissued in 1910, and a bulletin on "An emergency in the life of a river"; also an article appearing in the North American Review in 1883, and another article which appeared in that publication in 1884. Not any one of them is long The document will perhaps comprise from 120 to 125 printed pages, and will form a very valuable and complete discussion of the whole subject.

Mr. BURTON. I think I may say to the members of the Committee on Printing, if these documents are referred to that committee, that these addresses would constitute a very valuable contribution to the subject; but I am anxious to know whether the Senator from Louisiana can assure me that they include all the addresses by Judge Taylor before the Senate Committee on Commerce. There is one he delivered—I can not recall the exact date—but I am unable to find any copies of it in the rooms of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. RANSDELL. I have before me an address which was sent me by Judge Taylor himself. I wrote the other day and asked him to send me copies of all his articles and hearings on the subject. He replied that some of them had been misplaced, but he did send me a copy of the hearings before the Senate Commerce Committee, as I have stated, on March 2, 1910, and I rather think that is the article to which the Senator from Ohio refers.

Mr. BURTON. I am not positive, but my impression is that it was later.

Mr. RANSDELL. I should like to say that if there are other articles, with the consent of the Senate, I should be very glad to have them included. My purpose is to make this document as complete as possible.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The documents will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

PUBLICATION OF EXECUTIVE SESSION PROCEEDINGS.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Senate yesterday held a very long session behind closed doors for the purpose of considering a motion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] to make public certain testimony of Mr. Thomas D. Jones. I notice this morning's Washington Post devotes four columns to our proceedings, including an accurate production of the testimony which was read from the record. It was suggested to me that since scarcely any mention is made by that paper of our proceedings in open session, that the best way from now on to secure publicity for what we do and say is to hold all of our sessions behind closed doors. I am in favor of publicity, and I have assumed that we could get it only by open sessions. I am now well convinced that publicity is the result of curiosity, which we can arouse by closing our doors, and thus attract, through the columns of the press, the attention of the public to all grave affairs which for various reasons are supposed to be carried on behind closed doors.

Another thing which requires favorable comment in this connection is that the reports of our proceedings behind closed doors are not only more elaborate but in some respects more correct than are the reports of proceedings in open session.

INDUSTRIAL CONDITIONS.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] yesterday showed such kindly solicitude regarding business conditions in my home town of Wilmington, Del., that I thought possibly it might be interesting to get for him, and for the benefit of the Senate, which had read into its RECORD an alleged newspaper dispatch, the exact conditions so far as business conditions there could be shown by bank clearings, which, I fancy, are about as near an index of the business of a city as can be had. So I have taken the trouble to obtain the comparative clearings in my city for the last four years.

I desire to say for the benefit of my distinguished friend that the bank clearings for the last calendar and fiscal years of the Clearing House Association of Wilmington have been much greater than for any like year during the past four years. I will state that for the fiscal year of the clearing house association, which ends regularly on March 31, that the clearings for the year ending March 31, 1914, exceeded those of 1913 by $12,000,000; that they exceeded those of 1912 by $20,000,000; that they exceeded those of 1911 by $21,000,000, and those of 1910 by $23,700,000.

For the calendar year ending December 31, 1913, the clearings exceeded those of 1912 by $5,000,000, those of 1911 by $20,000,000, and those of 1910 by $20,000,000. The clearings for the year ending March 31 last exceeded those for the year ending December 31, 1913, by $10,000,000. I think that the trade condition in one's own locality should not be misrepresented, at least by newspaper reports read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] suggested that I had put in the RECORD on yesterday an alleged dispatch to the press concerning conditions in Wilmington. The Senator further suggested that misrepresentations were being made concerning the prosperity of the State which he so ably represents, or the chief city of that State. I desire to have read another "alleged" dispatch which I find in the papers of this morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

WORK FOR UNEMPLOYED.

WILMINGTON, DEL., July 14.

In order to provide work for the unemployed, if possible to do so, the levy court to-day asked its attorney for an opinion as to whether it could legally bid upon its own work as is done in other places. The matter was brought up by Commissioner Burris, who thought that it was necessary to do something to give men out of employment work on public improvements.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am not going to burden the RECORD to any considerable extent, but I have an excerpt here, not from an "alleged" dispatch, but from a statement by a man who represents a very large constituency, namely, the coal miners of the United States. I should like to have it read, and then I will cease.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

40,000 MINERS OUT OF WORK.

Duncan McDonald, secretary-treasurer of the Illinois Mine Workers, addressing the State efficiency and economy committee last week, announced that 40,000 of the 90,000 members of his order in the State are out of work.

"Many of these miners are on the verge of starvation," said Mr. McDonald, "as we have not enough money in our relief fund to supply them all. Eighteen mining companies failed last year, and probably more than that number will fail this year." People of Illinois had no idea of the desperate condition in the mining industry until Mr. McDonald came to the front with the facts. There are various causes for this condition, which is attributed to overproduction of coal. When factories are closed, or running half time, when industries of all kinds are hedging as closely as possible, the demand for coal diminishes, the companies that try to continue in business fail, and the miners lose their positions and they and their families go hungry. The price of beefsteak or imported clothing makes no difference to them, as they can buy neither.

LOOK FOR ONLY TEMPORARY RELIEF.

People of the Middle West believe better times are in sight, but they also believe that the improvement will be brief. It will reach its zenith while the immense crops are being marketed, and the money therefrom distributed, but after that there is no assurance of anything resembling stable or permanent relief. Mortgages will be lifted, debts canceled, there will be a brisk business in the automobile trade, in the clothing and household supplies trade, and then the country will settle down to a long, hard winter. The manufacturers of Europe, who have been the chief beneficiaries of the new tariff, will get much of the money, and the chances are that the smokestacks of American mills and factories will continue cold, and the miners and others who thrive when home industry thrives will continue to look for jobs.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I only desire to say what I think the distinguished senior Senator from New Hampshire knows, that when I used the word "alleged," in connection with the dispatch which he had read into the RECORD on yesterday, I did not mean to impute any bad faith on his part. My thought was that no sensible newspaper would pay telegraph rates on any such stuff; certainly no newspaper would be justified in spending more than a single postage stamp in securing such an item as was inserted in the RECORD on yesterday; and therefore I concluded that it must be an alleged dispatch which came by mail. I had no idea of casting the slightest imputation at all on my distinguished friend from New Hampshire.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I desire to say that I had intended this morning to make an observation or two on what the Senator from New Hampshire said on yesterday, and particularly in regard to the editorial from the Washington Post which he had read. I have sent for some data, however, which I thought I should have this morning; and not having it now, I shall probably lay it before the Senator from New Hampshire publicly to-morrow morning.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I have something in the same line as that presented by the Senator from New Hampshire, which will no doubt entertain the Senate, especially as it comes from me, until the Senate ascertains the time to which it relates.

First, I want to read a statement from a newspaper that the total number of unemployed in the United States is estimated at 1,200,000, including half that number in large cities, New York having 250,000 unemployed and Chicago 90,000.

That is even better upon the calamity side than claimed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Also, that the total number of unemployed in the city of Chicago is estimated by the Federation of Labor at 100,000, and a warning was issued to craftsmen to keep away from that city. We also read that in Chicago Bulgarians numbering 700 appealed to the city and county authorities for deportation to their own country, and so forth in various cities.

When I explain to the Senate, however, that these were newspaper accounts published in the year 1908, when the Republicans were in control of this country, they will see that the cold facts gathered by business men when there was no combination of capitalists to create impressions falsely and to make the same combination in news which they had in business, the force and effect of this matter will be better understood by the Senate.

I have a compilation of that tale of woe from different cities of the United States published in the year 1908, during Mr. Roosevelt's term as President. I should like to insert it in the RECORD, so as to show that the slight things they are talking about now are nothing as compared with the actual facts in 1908. I will cull these and insert them. They are exact extracts from newspaper accounts in the year 1908.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Charleston (W. Va.) Gazette, Tuesday, June 23, 1914.]

PROSPEROUS TIMES NOW COMPARED WITH 1907-8.

Republicans, Bull Moose, and politicians of several brands have charged the Democratic Party with incompetency in business affairs. The Tory Republican press has dilated on the alleged depression in American business since the enactment of the Wilson tariff law and the new banking act.

But if evidence of a real depression is wanted, compared to which present conditions are highly prosperous, it is only necessary to turn to a real panic during the Republican régime—that of 1907—when the Republicans had been in power 11 years.

The following is industrial history of the period following the panic:

Chicago: Total unemployed estimated by Federation of Labor at 100,000. Warning issued to craftsmen to keep away from the city. February 11, 1908.

Chicago: Bulgarians numbering 700 appealed to city and county authorities for aid and for deportation to their own country. April 8, 1908.

Buffalo: Five hundred men besiege office of superintendent of poor for food. Four men taken to hospital suffering from starvation. January 20, 1908.

Camden, N. J.: Riot follows application of 1,500 men for 400 jobs advertised by the Joseph Campbell Co. August 10, 1908.

Denver: More than 200 Bulgarians petition governor for employment or aid to return to Bulgaria. March 20, 1908.

Detroit: More than 2,000 men march to the city hall to solicit work of mayor. January 28, 1908.

Grant City, Mo.: Fifty men kneel before various churches pleading for work. One man killed himself because he failed to obtain work. April 25, 1908.

New York: School children numbering 5,000 mob the restaurant of Adolph Lorber to obtain free meals offered by Mr. Lorber. February 12, 1908.

New York: Government urged by Central Federation Labor Union to let contract for subway to furnish work for 500,000 unemployed. March 15, 1908.

New York: Demonstration in favor of revolution made by 10,000 unemployed singing the Marseillaise and other inciting songs. Bomb thrown at police by anarchist during the demonstration. March 28, 1908.

Philadelphia: Total of 50,000 idle reported by the labor unions in the Kensington district February 10, 1908.

Philadelphia: Riot follows march of 1,000 foreigners, chiefly women, to the city hall to demand employment. Three policemen shot and fourteen unemployed arrested February 20, 1908.

Philadelphia: Loan of $9,000,000 to provide funds for public work asked by the city for unemployed. Race riot followed demonstration of unemployed demanding work. Italians attacked by men of other nationalities.

San Francisco: Organized unemployed league formed; demands the issue of $23,000,000 in bonds to aid unemployed January 28, 1908.

Toledo: One thousand Hungarians marched through the rain to receive a loaf of rye bread each March 23, 1908.

United States: Total unemployed estimated at 1,200,000, including half that number in large cities. New York, 250,000 unemployed; Chicago, 90,000.

This is the Republican record of the winter of 1908, immediately following the panic in the later part of 1907. This was under the Republican rule of Col. Roosevelt, who now criticizes the economic policies of President Wilson and their interference with prosperity. Significantly nobody has heard in 1914 of bread riots and of millions of unemployed and all the other earmarks of a full-grown depression.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I rise to correct what seems to me to be an inaccuracy. I understand it was published, or is to be published, in the Republican campaign book.

The announcement was made that the Progressive Party was dying. I think this is probably not a correct diagnosis, as I gather from the physician at the bedside of the patient that it only has sore throat.

I think this correction ought to be made.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have the Secretary read a letter published in the Wall Street Journal from Mr. Henry B. Endicott, the head of the United States Shoe Machinery Co., which I understand is one of the largest manufacturing companies in the world.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am not going to object to the reading of this editorial, nor to other editorials——

Mr. SIMMONS. It is not an editorial at all. It is an article containing a letter written by the head of this great manufacturing concern.

Mr. BORAH. Whatever it is, I am not going to object to it at this time, but I think we had better have a unanimous-consent agreement to the effect that prosperity is here and proceed to transact the business of the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will join me in a resolution unanimously affirming that prosperity is here, I will withdraw the article.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I will agree to the unanimous consent if it will enable us to proceed to the business of the Senate and go home.

Mr CLAPP. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not desire to get into any controversy about the reading of this article; but the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has risen here on the last two days during the morning hour and caused to be put in the RECORD certain clippings, and this is a letter from the head of this great manufacturing concern giving his views about the business situation in the country in his particular line of industry. In view of the action of the Senator from New Hampshire, I think Senators ought not to object to my request to have this letter read; but if there is any objection to it on the part of the Senators representing the other side, I will withdraw it.

Mr. GALLINGER. There certainly will be no objection on my part, but I do not wish to be put in the attitude of having precipitated this discussion in the first place. The Senator must go back of the Senator from New Hampshire to find the origin, the genesis, of this matter of placing newspaper extracts in the RECORD.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator on yesterday offered some clippings. I then said that I would insert some clippings, but I did not get the opportunity. The Senator has again to-day offered some clippings, and I had a couple of short clippings that I desired to put in the RECORD. As I say, I withdraw this one if there is any objection coming from the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I want to make a statement without taking part in a controversy or reflecting upon anyone.

There would be no objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Idaho about entering into unanimous consent, because every man in this country who is at work knows he is at work, and every man who is out of work knows he is out of work. It is a good deal like the time we used to spend here, after the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill was passed, reciting every morning the price of household commodities, when every woman in this country knew what she was paying for them.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I hope there will be no objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair did not hear any, and the article has already been ordered to be read.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The inundation of newspaper clippings each morning simply indicates the advanced policy of the other side of the Chamber with reference to "pitiless publicity." I hope it may continue in all respects.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I withdraw the request if there is to be a controversy about it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator from Michigan referred to the matter of publicity. I understood that on yesterday he had in his possession some very authoritative expressions on that subject. If he has them now, I should like to know it, and should like to have him present them to the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, let the article be read. There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Which one—the one asked for by the Senator from Washington?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Both of them.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, as there seems to be so much trouble about the article, I withdraw it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina withdraws the article.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, there is no trouble about it. Nobody objects.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask for the regular order.

COMPILATION OF TARIFF ACTS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution (No. 44) of the House of Representatives, which was read and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed and bound 10,000 copies of the compilation entitled "Comparison of the tariff acts of 1909 and 1913, showing the classification, rates of duty, and sections of the acts of August 5, 1909, and of October 3, 1913, together with the equivalent ad valorem rates of duty on the imports for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913," as prepared under the direction of the Ways and Means Committee by John E. Walker, assistant clerk to the committee; 5,500 copies for the use of the House, 2,500 copies for the use of the Senate, and 2,000 copies for the use of the Ways and Means Committee.

MAY STANLEY.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1644) for the relief of May Stanley, and for other purposes.

Mr. WORKS. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House, request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. BRYAN, Mr. OVERMAN, and Mr. CRAWFORD conferees on the part of the Senate.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

H. J. Res. 300. To continue the provisions of a joint resolution approved June 30, 1914, entitled "Joint resolution extending appropriations for the necessary operations of the Government and of the District of Columbia under certain contingencies," was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

TREATIES WITH NICARAGUA AND COLOMBIA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day, which will be read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 411, submitted on the 6th instant by Mr. BORAH, as follows:

Resolved, That the seal of secrecy is hereby removed from all of the hearings heretofore had which have been printed, except such testimony as may have been received under a pledge of confidence, and that hereafter all hearings be given to the public as soon as the same are corrected by the parties and printed, touching the proposed treaties with Nicaragua and Colombia, and that the consideration of both the treaties with Nicaragua and Colombia be in the open session of the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. I understand there is a motion pending that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the motion pending.

Mr. BORAH. If I can have a yea-and-nay vote upon the proposition, I shall not detain the Senate in the discussion of this matter any further. Upon the motion pending I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KERN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll for a quorum.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Goff	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.
Borah	Gronna	Newlands	Smith, Md.
Brady	Hughes	Norris	Smith, Mich.
Brandegee	James	Overman	Smoot
Bryan	Johnson	Page	Sterling
Burton	Jones	Perkins	Stone
Camden	Kenyon	Pittman	Swanson
Catron	Kern	Poindexter	Thomas
Chamberlain	Lea, Tenn.	Ransdell	Thornton
Chilton	Lewis	Saulsbury	Townsend
Clapp	Lippitt	Sheppard	West
Colt	McCumber	Simmons	White
Gallinger	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ariz.	Works

Mr. KENYON. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. PAGE. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM] is necessarily absent from the city. He is paired with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. I should like to have this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY]. This announcement will stand for the day.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] and also of my colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. Both Senators have pairs. I will allow this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. KENYON. I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. CUMMINS]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. I will let this announcement stand for the day. He has a general pair.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH].

Mr. STONE. What is the question immediately before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-two Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The pending question is upon the motion to refer to the Committee on Foreign Relations the resolution introduced by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. May we have the resolution read?

Mr. STONE. Before that is done I wish to make a point of order on the resolution. I speak now to the resolution rather than the motion to refer; but I think the point of order could be equally applicable to one as the other. I make the point of order that a resolution of this kind can not be considered in the open session of the Senate, since it refers to executive business, so made under the rules of the Senate. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that this very question has been frequently ruled upon. I find in the collection of Precedents, by Mr. Gilfry, at the bottom of page 180, the Forty-eighth Congress, first session, the following:

15. FOR RECIPROCITY WITH MEXICO.

(48th Cong., 1st sess.; Jour., p. 195; Jan. 21, 1884.)

Mr. Van Wyck submitted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That any further consideration of the reciprocity treaty between Mexico and the United States be had in open session of the Senate";

Whereupon, Mr. Anthony objected to the reception of the resolution during the legislative session of the Senate, it being in the nature of business which would be considered in executive session.

From the decision of the Chair Mr. Van Wyck appealed to the Senate; and

A motion having been submitted by Mr. Edmunds that the doors be closed, and the same having been seconded,

The Presiding Officer directed that the galleries be cleared and the doors closed.

At the bottom of the next page I find the following:

18. PENDING WITH CHINA.

(53d Cong., 2d sess.; Jour., p. 155; Apr. 17, 1894.)

Mr. Mitchell, of Oregon, submitted the following resolution, which was ordered to lie on the table:

"Resolved, That the pending Chinese treaty be considered in open session."

(Ib.; Jour., p. 178; May 7, 1894.)

The Vice President laid before the Senate the resolution submitted by Mr. Mitchell, of Oregon, April 17, 1894, as follows:

"Resolved, That the pending Chinese treaty be considered in open session";

Whereupon, Mr. Chandler moved that the doors be closed; and the motion having been seconded,

The Vice President directed the galleries to be cleared and the doors closed.

Of course, that can be done now. Such a motion can be made; but we find further, at the bottom of page 184—

(53d Cong., 2d sess.; Jour., p. 50; Jan. 16, 1894.)

Mr. Call gave notice that he would move to suspend a part of Rule XXXVIII, his object being to have the nomination of the internal-revenue collector for Florida considered in open session, and he submitted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That so much of Rule XXXVIII, paragraph 2, as is contained in the following words: 'All information communicated or remarks made by a Senator, when acting on nominations concerning the character or qualifications of the person nominated, also all votes upon any nomination, shall be kept secret,' shall be suspended in the consideration of the nomination of the collector of internal revenue of the State of Florida."

Mr. Hoar raised the question as to whether the resolution should not be discussed with closed doors when taken up for consideration, and, pending the question, moved that the doors be closed.

I call the attention of the Chair especially now to what I shall read from the same page—page 184, paragraph 25:

Mr. Call gave notice of his intention to move certain amendments to the rules, the object of which was to permit the consideration of the nominations of Charles Swain and Joseph N. Stripling in open executive session.

(Ib.; Jour., p. 172; Mar. 17, 1890.)

Pursuant to the notice given on the 14th instant that he would move to amend the thirty-sixth and thirty-eighth rules of the Senate, in order to allow the consideration of the nominations of Charles Swain and Joseph N. Stripling in open executive session, Mr. Call asked the reading of a resolution which he had sent to the Secretary's desk.

The President pro tempore (John J. Ingalls) declined to entertain the resolution, and decided that a motion to consider matters relating to executive business in open executive session must be made when the Senate is in executive session; whereupon, Mr. Sherman submitted a motion that the doors be closed, and, the same having been seconded by Mr. Edmunds, the President pro tempore directed the galleries to be cleared and the doors closed; and

After proceeding with closed doors and the consideration of executive business, the doors were reopened.

Former Senator Ingalls was well regarded, I think, as one of the best presiding officers the Senate has ever had and one of its ablest parliamentarians. He decided that a resolution concerning executive business could only be submitted in an executive session. Then the Senate went into executive session for the purpose of considering the resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. On motion.

Mr. STONE. Yes; it was on motion. The Senate can not go into executive session except on motion; at least, I do not know of any other way.

Now, I put the question to the Chair whether that is not a good ruling which was made by the then presiding officer, to which I have called attention, that Senators can not undertake to discuss, under a resolution or motion, executive business in open session?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Missouri pardon the Chair? The Chair has not the precedent where the presiding officer took the initiative.

Mr. STONE. Has the Chair a copy of the book from which I am reading?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; but the Chair has not the precedent where the presiding officer took the initiative.

Mr. STONE. If the Chair will turn to the middle of page 184, beginning with the words and figures—

25. Chair declines to entertain motion in open session relative to executive business.

The Chair will find that in the book which he has before him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. STONE. Now, if the Chair will follow the language down to next to the last paragraph he will find the words—

The President pro tempore (John J. Ingalls) declined to entertain the resolution, and decided that a motion to consider matters relating to executive business in open executive session must be made when the Senate is in executive session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That was with reference to nominations. Where is the rule of the Senate that at any stage of the proceedings the Senate may not remove the injunction of secrecy from treaties? This motion, the Chair understands, refers to treaties.

Mr. STONE. At any stage of the proceedings in executive session a motion can be made and considered; but I think the ruling to which I have called attention is directly in point. It is true in that particular instance the business before the Senate related to appointments; but that was executive business just as a treaty is executive business, and the Chair declined to entertain the motion or resolution, holding that it could be heard only in executive session; and he refused to put the question to the Senate in open legislative session.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Missouri that, if my recollection serves me, the motion to remove the injunction of secrecy from a treaty has been made at this session of Congress in legislative session on the floor by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and carried.

Mr. SMOOT. And I will also say such a motion was made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], and carried.

Mr. President, I will call the Senator's attention to the fact that in the case cited, in which the President pro tempore, Hon. John J. Ingalls, declined to entertain the resolution, there was no appeal from that decision, and Mr. Sherman submitted a motion that the doors be closed. The Senate did not go into executive session, but the doors were closed, just the same as they were closed yesterday on the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. Of course, I myself believe that the Senator from Missouri could make that motion now on this resolution, but I do not believe that it applies to an executive session, especially when Rule XXXVI, paragraph 3, specifically states:

And all treaties which may be laid before the Senate, and all remarks, votes, and proceedings thereon, shall also be kept secret, until the Senate shall, by their resolution, take off the injunction of secrecy, or unless the same shall be considered in open executive session.

The injunction of secrecy as to executive sessions has been removed time and time again by a vote in open session; and, as the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] says, it has been done two or three times at this session of Congress.

Mr. STONE. It may have been done, Mr. President, two or three times at this session of Congress; it may have been done previously; but I am sure it was never done when the point of order was made against it. It was done in the way of unanimous consent, there being no objection to it. A great many things may be done here that are violative of the rules when no point is made against them, when no objection is raised; but a different situation is presented where the objection is raised, as I raise it now, and the point of order is presented that such a resolution as that pending can be offered and considered only in executive session, or at least can only be considered in executive session. That point has been directly ruled upon, as it seems to me, by a previous President pro tempore of the Senate, who for years, as we know, because of the death of the Vice President at that time, was presiding officer continuously of this body for a long period and achieved a very distinguished reputation as a presiding officer and as a parliamentarian; and I think that his ruling is entitled to very great weight and should be controlling. It is true that it was not appealed from, and it is true that the motion which I made yesterday was made and seconded by another Senator, that the doors be closed. That course was taken, and that course could be taken here this morning; there is no question about that. I have not seen proper, however, so far, at least, to make any such motion, but to raise the question that the resolution itself can not be considered except in a regular executive session.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I make no pretensions to expert knowledge as to parliamentary law, but before introducing this resolution I made such investigation as I could and gathered such information as was at hand, and I came to the conclusion that if the resolution related to the nomination of an officer whose name had been submitted for confirmation by the Senate I would not be entitled to make this motion in open session. I came to the conclusion, however, that with reference to the treaties there were no precedents to be found against this procedure. I believe that the precedents, in so far as they have been cited or can be found, have no bearing on the matter now before the Senate that is contrary to the course which is now being pursued. The precedents cited by the Senator from Missouri relate to the question of nominations and the confirmation of appointees. There is a way by which the Senator from Missouri can have the matter disposed of behind closed doors; but it is not subject, Mr. President, in my judgment, to the point of order, and it is particularly not so at this stage of the proceedings.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will inquire whether there is pending before the Senate of the United States a treaty with Nicaragua or a treaty with Colombia?

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, there is a treaty pending between the United States and Colombia; there is no treaty pending between the United States and Nicaragua.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There will probably be an appeal from the ruling of the Chair, but the Chair is going to make a ruling. Of course the precedents cited are those that have no relation to treaties and are the rulings of a preceding occupant of the chair, and always "the dead are great." The Chair is expressing no opinion at all upon the advisability of the consideration of treaties in executive session. That is a matter of the rules of the Senate. The Chair believes, however, that it was the intention at the time of the adoption of the rules of the Senate that all matters with reference to treaties with foreign governments, which in the judgment of the Chair would embrace the action of the committee thereon, should be considered in executive session, unless the seal of secrecy should be removed by the action of the Senate. The Chair believes that that action should first be taken in an executive session of the Senate.

The point of order as to the resolution presented by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], however, has its difficulties. To the mind of the Chair it is a resolution directed to a treaty now pending before the Senate of the United States and under consideration by the Committee on Foreign Relations. As to the treaty with Colombia, however wrong the Chair may be, the Chair has no doubt that the rules of the Senate require that all proceedings of the committee and of the Senate shall be in executive session until a motion be made in executive session to remove the seal of secrecy. As to the Nicaraguan matter, however, there seems to be no treaty pending before the Senate of the United States; so that the Chair would have no doubt about sustaining the point of order as to the Colombian treaty, but the Chair has doubt about the so-called Nicaraguan treaty, there being in reality no such treaty and there being nothing properly before the Senate as in executive session with reference to Nicaragua.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, in order that we may have the matter finally disposed of, I desire to take an appeal from the ruling of the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be very agreeable to the Chair to have an appeal taken. In view of the fact that the Colombian treaty is mentioned in the resolution, the Chair sustains the point of order. An appeal is taken.

Mr. BORAH. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. STONE. As I understand, the question now is whether the ruling of the Chair shall be sustained.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the question, but the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] has suggested the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gronna	Overman	Sterling
Bankhead	Hollis	Page	Stone
Borah	Hughes	Perkins	Swanson
Brady	James	Pittman	Thomas
Brandegee	Jones	Poindexter	Thompson
Bryan	Kenyon	Ransdell	Thornton
Burton	Kern	Saulsbury	Tillman

Mr. VARDAMAN. I have been requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]. He is detained from the Chamber on important public business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

The Chair decided that the resolution of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] must be considered in executive session, and sustained a point of order against its consideration in open session. From that ruling of the Chair the Senator from Idaho has taken an appeal and has called for the yeas and nays. The request has been seconded, and the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question is, Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate? The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], and in the absence of a transfer I withhold my vote.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. Unless I can get a transfer, I shall withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). I transfer the standing pair I have with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] to the junior senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], who is absent from the Senate on important business. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] and therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CATRON. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], who is absent on account of sickness, and vote "nay."

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I have a pair with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. I discover that he is not present and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. CHILTON. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS. Has the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. MYERS. I have a pair with that Senator and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] and will vote. I vote "yea."

So the ruling of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I suppose the motion should come properly from the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations; but if the chairman does not desire to do so, I desire to make a motion to go into executive session to consider this matter. I make that motion, Mr. President.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Idaho if he is willing to withhold that motion for just a moment, in order to permit the passage of a resolution continuing the appropriations, as it is rather an urgent matter?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

EXTENSION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. From the Committee on Appropriations I report a resolution, for which I ask immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read.

The resolution (H. J. Res. 300) to continue the provisions of a joint resolution approved June 30, 1914, entitled "Joint resolution extending appropriations for the necessary operations of the Government and of the District of Columbia under certain contingencies," was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the provisions of a joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution extending appropriations for the necessary operations of the Government and of the District of Columbia under certain contingencies," approved June 30, 1914, are extended and continued in full force and effect for and during the last half of the month of July, fiscal year 1915; and to continue during the last half of the month of July, fiscal year 1915, the operation of the Interstate Commerce Commission in securing a valuation of the several classes of property of carriers, subject to the act to regulate commerce, authorized by the act of March 1, 1913, a sufficient amount is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, not to exceed the sum of $65,000, together with any unexpended balance of a similar sum appropriated for the first half of said month of July.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TREATIES WITH NICARAGUA AND COLOMBIA.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. STONE. The Senator stated either that he would make or he did make a motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. I wish to state to the Senator that I intended at an early hour this afternoon to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. The reason why I did not do so at once was that there was some legislative business here that I understood it was desired to have transacted.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand the Senator, he proposes at an early hour to move an executive session?

Mr. STONE. I did.

Mr. BORAH. I have no desire to urge the motion in view of that statement, and I withdraw the motion.

AFFAIRS IN MEXICO.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 415) introduced by Mr. SMITH of Michigan on the 13th instant, as follows:

Whereas the publication of certain correspondence has been made the basis of allegations in many newspapers that certain persons owing allegiance to and domiciled in the United States have been engaged in correspondence with the authorities of the so-called constitutionalist government of Mexico for the purpose of thwarting the designs of the United States Government and for the promotion of their own interests; and

Whereas in certain of this correspondence agents of the President of the United States have been represented as affording advice to the agents of the said rebellion against the Government of Mexico, intended to enable said revolutionists to evade the orders of the President of the United States against the shipment of arms and munitions of war into Mexico: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations or a subcommittee thereof is hereby authorized and directed to inquire, investigate, ascertain, and report whether any person, associations, or corporations domiciled in or owing allegiance to the United States have heretofore been or are now engaged in correspondence with those in rebellion against the Government of Mexico and in violation of the laws of the United States, or whether any persons, associations, or corporations have heretofore been or are now engaged in financing, encouraging, or inciting civil strife in Mexico for the promotion of their own interests or for any other reasons, and whether any agents of the President of the United States have been heretofore or are now engaged in giving advice to those in rebellion against the Government of Mexico to enable or lead such agents or authorities to constructively evade the orders of the President of the United States against the shipment of arms or munitions of war into Mexico, or whether any agents of the Government of the United States may be in any way personally or financially interested for their own gain or profit in the regrettable strife in Mexico.

Resolved further, That said committee or a subcommittee thereof is hereby empowered to summon witnesses, to send for persons or papers, to administer oaths, and to take and secure whatever testimony and evidence that may be required to ascertain and report upon the matters aforesaid; and said committee or a subcommittee thereof is hereby authorized for the purpose aforesaid to sit wherever necessary and act as well when Congress is not in session as when in session.

Resolved further, That the said committee is hereby directed to report the result of said investigation and inquiry to the Senate during the first month of the next session of Congress; and the expenses incurred by such investigation and inquiry shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, of course, I should like immediate consideration of the resolution, but I desire to consult the convenience of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I thought if it was agreeable to the Senator from Michigan, the resolution might go over until to-morrow morning.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Very well. Of course, it goes over until to-morrow without prejudice.

PAUL M. WARBURG.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day, which will be read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 413, submitted by Mr. POINDEXTER on the 13th instant, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby directed to report to the Senate the form, manner, and extent of the participation by Paul M. Warburg, recently nominated by the President for membership on the Federal Reserve Board, with the financial transaction or transfers or sales of stocks or bonds of the Rock Island, Chicago & Alton, and other railway companies or systems.

Mr. NORRIS. In the absence of the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], and as the morning hour is just about to expire, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may go over without prejudice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. NEWLANDS. What is the request?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the resolution going over without prejudice? The Chair hears none, and it goes over.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 15613.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I intend to make some remarks upon the pending bill, and I ask Senators kindly not to interrupt me until I have finished my speech, when I shall be glad to consider any questions that may be propounded to me.

I desire first to answer as well as I can certain propositions that were submitted to the Senate by the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and then to make some general observations on the purport of the trade commission bill.

In the very interesting and able discussions of the trade commission bill which have been made recently by the junior Senator from Missouri he has taken four positions:

First. That he is opposed to the bill because he does not believe in government by commission. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 11113.)

Second. That he is opposed to the bill because it constitutes a delegation of the powers of Congress. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 11114.)

Third. That he is opposed to the bill because there are no decisions of courts that amount to a rule of law as to what constitutes "unfair competition." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 11115.)

Fourth. That he is opposed to the bill because there are countless decisions of courts that lay down the exact meaning of "unfair competition." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 11875-11876.)

GOVERNMENT BY COMMISSION.

The arguments presented by the learned Senator were all presented with force and earnestness when the Interstate Commerce Commission was under discussion. The same calamities were predicted. The same arbitrary power, "more arbitrary than that possessed by any king or potentate on earth," was depicted. The same claim was made that action by the commission would not be "due process of law"; that an order by such a commission would be confiscation. There was the same appeal to the "law of the land," the same reference to "constitutional liberty," and the same apostrophe to the "forefathers of our country."

But, despite these impassioned appeals and dire predictions, the Interstate Commerce Commission has proceeded to apply the law, proclaim rules and regulations, decide cases, and issue orders, to the great and growing satisfaction of the people and of the railroads, until it is the most notable success of our administrative government.

Opposition to the Interstate Commerce Commission and its orders has dwindled until there is complete acceptance of this particular form of "government by commission," and no one ever dreams of abolishing the commission and going back to the intolerable abuses that existed before the commission began its labors.

The burden is certainly upon him who objects to a trade commission to show why such a commission would not be as useful and satisfactory as the Interstate Commerce Commission. The distinguished Senator from Missouri has not pointed out any difference between the two in either theory or practice. He gives his opinion, and his colleagues may share that opinion or reject it, as their judgment may prompt them.

DELEGATION OF POWERS OF CONGRESS.

The other three reasons given by the Senator are not matters of opinion but matters of law, to be determined by legal precedents.

The Senator made a downright, positive assertion that the law would be unconstitutional because it would constitute a delegation of the powers of Congress, and he bottomed his assertion on the authority of a single case—Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. v. McChord (103 Fed. Rep., 216).

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEA of Tennessee in the chair). Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HOLLIS. I must decline to yield. I shall be glad to yield later.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire declines to yield.

Mr. HOLLIS. I shall be glad to answer any questions when I have finished.

Mr. REED. After a statement of that kind I do not wonder that the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire declines to yield.

Mr. REED. Declines to have an answer interjected into his remarks.

Mr. HOLLIS. From this case the Senator from Missouri read copious extracts, covering about two pages of the RECORD.

Since then several Senators have cited more than a dozen decisions by the Supreme Court of the United States directly contrary to the McChord case, and the distinguished Senator from Iowa has shown that the McChord case was itself reversed by the United States Supreme Court on appeal (183 U. S., 483), while the reasoning of the judge quoted at such length by the Senator from Missouri was expressly repudiated by the Supreme Court in Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. v. Garrett (231 U. S., 298), in which the same Kentucky statute and the same question were considered.

NO DECISIONS DEFINING "UNFAIR COMPETITION."

The assertion of the Senator regarding the lack of decisions defining "unfair competition" was equally positive:

Mr. President, I undertake to say that there are no decisions of courts that amount to a rule of law as to what constitutes unfair competition. (RECORD, p. 11115.)

The statement was downright and unqualified. It carried the impression that the Senator had examined the question and knew what he was talking about.

The best answer to this third proposition is the Senator's fourth proposition, made just three weeks later, in which he asserts that there are numerous cases defining "unfair competition"—"all through the books"; in "digests, textbooks, and dictionaries of law"; in "English decisions"; in "courts of this country," giving to the term "unfair competition" a "definite, fixed meaning." (RECORD, p. 11875.)

"UNFAIR COMPETITION" RESTRICTED TO SUBSTITUTION OF GOODS.

In his remarks on this subject on July 13 the distinguished Senator challenged any friend of the bill to produce an authority to show that the term "unfair competition" covers the abuses at which this bill is aimed. Before I conclude I shall produce many such authorities. But first I may be pardoned for the suggestion that the Senator was equally emphatic when he based his first argument on an overruled case, and his second argument on a proposition he has himself overruled.

I have tried to find the latest edition of Black's Law Dictionary, which was quoted from copiously by the Senator in his speech. I have not been able to find it, but it is no doubt correctly quoted from. I do find, however, in Black's Law Dictionary, edition of 1891, page 238, the following:

Competition: In Scotch practice. The contest among creditors claiming on their respective diligences, or creditors claiming on their securities.

Now, there is a definition of the word "competition," and, under the reasoning of the Senator, because unfair competition is defined in a dictionary or in cases as applying only to cases of palming off goods or substitution, then the same argument would apply here, and when the word "competition" is used it has this extremely limited meaning. But would anyone argue that this precise, limited meaning of the word "competition" would bind courts in construing a statute dealing with competition?

I have looked through Anderson's Law Dictionary, through Abbott's Law Dictionary, and Bouvier's Law Dictionary, and I find no such limited definition of "unfair competition."

I have carefully examined many of the cases cited by the Senator to establish the point that the term "unfair competition" is confined in law exclusively to the practice of substituting one kind of goods for another. None of these cases supports the Senator's proposition. All of them, it is true, are cases in which the complainant sought to prevent the defendant from "palming off" his own goods in place of the complainant's. It was held in each case that such practices do legally constitute "unfair competition," but no case holds that "unfair competition" is limited to this class of trade deception. Any such declaration would be at best obiter dictum, for that point could not, from the nature of the case, be involved in the decision of the suit. It was for the court to decide in each instance whether the particular case came within the law against unfair competition, not whether some other case lay outside it.

The case of Coca Cola Co. v. Gay Ola Co. (200 Fed. Rep., 720), cited by the Senator and discussed by him, is a fair illustration of all his precedents. It was there held that the manufacture and sale of an article in close imitation of the plaintiffs product, with the evident purpose of deceiving consumers, constituted "unfair competition," and should be enjoined. There is not a suggestion in the case that "unfair competition" is confined to the kind of practice described in the complaint. It might as well be argued that when a man is convicted of forging a bank check, and the conviction is affirmed, the case is authority for the proposition that a man can not be convicted of forging anything besides bank checks—stock certificates, for example. The argument would be that because a man had been convicted of forging bank checks the crime of forging must be confined to that particular kind of fraudulent penwork.

The case of Everett Piano Co. v. Maus (200 Fed Rep., 718), upon which the Senator places special emphasis, is wide of the mark. In that case the complainant applied for an injunction, but the court held that there was an adequate remedy at law, and the petition for injunction must therefore be dismissed. It is clear that if the suit had been at law to recover damages the court would have held it to be a case of unfair competition warranting a verdict for the plaintiff. The observation of the court that the bill did not state a case of "unfair competition" was not essential to the decision of the case, and was therefore obiter dictum.

It is true that in cases similar to trade-mark suits, where the complaint is that the defendant is "palming off" his goods for those of the complainant, it has grown to be the custom to apply the term "unfair competition" to cases which equity will enjoin. But there is nothing in the cases to show that the term is applied exclusively to such cases. This is merely one kind of "unfair competition." I shall now proceed to cite many cases of an entirely different class in which the term is used by the courts.

In the course of his argument on Monday last, the Senator from Missouri issued this challenge:

I challenge any man to bring here the decision of a court holding that "unfair competition" is any other or different than I have defined it from the books. (RECORD, p. 12026.)

The first case I shall cite in response to the challenge is the case of the State v. Central Lumber Co. (123 N. W. Rep., S. Dak., 504), where the court was passing upon the constitutionality of a statute of South Dakota prohibiting unfair competition by discrimination in prices. The court, by Whiting, judge, said, at page 509:

To get rid of competition and thus acquire a monopoly the man, firm, or corporation possessed of or controlling large capital no longer said to his competitor: "Let us combine and thus obtain a monopoly of the business we are engaged in and by so doing increase our profits by raising prices to the consumer." No; that would be criminal, and might lead to trouble, and, too, it was a crude way of acquiring the thing sought. Now he says to a competitor, if such competitor be weaker than he: "Get out of my way. Sell me your business or I will destroy it by unfair competition"; or, in many cases, without giving his victim a chance to sell him the business he has, he sets about destroying it, and by a method as certain as the passing of time; a method that need bring him not even an immediate financial loss. He puts the price of the commodity handled so low at the point where his victim is in business as to make it impossible to meet such price except at a loss, and to offset what loss he suffers at that point he raises prices at one or more other points. * * * Again, human experience, recognizing the laws of God and nature, controlled and guided by an aroused public conscience, evolved a new law and placed it upon the statute books of this and many other States—a law aimed at monopolies obtained through unfair competition. * * * We believe it is inherent in the powers of the State to protect one citizen against "unfair competition" of another citizen where such "unfair competition" is used as a means to and with the intent to deprive such other of his rightful enjoyment of property or the use thereof.

Here is a case from South Dakota construing a law against unfair competition, using the term "unfair competition" in several places, and using it obviously without the limited application contended for; that is, in a case involving a substitution of goods. Other cases to the same effect are State v. Drayton (62 Nebr., 254), State v. Standard Oil Co. (111 Minn., 85), and State v. Bridgman & Russell Co. (117 Minn., 186).

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. HOLLIS. If the Senator will pardon me, I stated at the outset that I would not care to be interrupted until I had concluded. I have already declined to yield.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Probably this question might help. I was only desirous to know what is the precise language of the statute. I am not addressing the inquiry in a hostile sense at all.

Mr. HOLLIS I think I have it.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The question is whether it is confined to the words "unfair competition" or whether it is supplemented by a reference to unfair competition in the cutting of prices.

Mr. HOLLIS. I will look it up and inform the Senator and place it in the RECORD later.

The next case I wish to refer to is the United States v. Patterson (205 Fed. Rep., 292). It was an indictment of officers of the National Cash Register Co. for violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act.

The indictment set out 11 methods of unfair competition. The defendants claimed that the alleged unlawful acts were committed against infringers of patents owned by the National Cash Register Co., and were therefore lawful.

The court denied this claim, holding that a patentee for the protection of his rights under the patent is limited to the pursuit of his legal remedies in the Federal courts.

The court, Hollister, judge, said, at page 300:

The doctrine, asserted in this case for the first time, that the rights of the patentee are of such character that those operating under them may agree, in order to protect them, to engage in acts of unfair competition such as are charged in this case, and even to burn their competitor's factory, or destroy the competing—as they believe, infringing—machines by violence * * * I am unable to agree with.

* * * * * * *

Aside from that one instance, however, there has been no evidence tending to show actual violence to a competitor's cash register in the possession of one of its customers. Therefore the argument of counsel for defendants goes further, with that one exception, than the acts of unfair competition the evidence for the Government tends to prove. But the principle is the same, whether the acts of unfair competition were acts of violence upon competitors' cash registers themselves or acts falling short of actual violence.

Here we have a case in the United States court having nothing whatever to do with substitution cases or "palming-off" cases, but applying the term "acts of unfair competition" to acts of violence upon competitors' cash registers themselves, or acts falling short of actual violence.

A case that has been referred to more than once and which has been brushed aside with very little attention by those who opposed this bill, but a case which would be the subject of a three hours' argument, if it happened to be decided the other way, in my opinion, is the case of the Standard Oil Co. v. The United States (231 U. S., pp. 42–43), where the court, by Mr. Justice White, said:

Without attempting to follow the elaborate averments on these subjects spread over 57 pages of the printed record, it suffices to say that such averments may properly be grouped under the following heads: Rebates, preferences, and other discriminatory practices in favor of the combination by railroad companies; restraint and monopolization by control of pipe lines, and unfair practices against competing pipe lines; contracts with competitors in restraint of trade; unfair methods of competition, such as local price cutting at the points where necessary to suppress competition, espionage of business competitors, the operation of bogus independent companies, and payments of rebates on oil, with the like intent.

Here was the Supreme Court of the United States speaking through its Chief Justice in a case that had nothing to do with substitution cases or "palming-off" cases, deliberately in summing up, using the words "unfair methods of competition" and defining them to be "such as local price cutting at the points where necessary to suppress competition, espionage of business competitors, the operation of bogus independent companies, and payments of rebates on oil, with the like intent."

It seems to me unthinkable that the Supreme Court of the United States, which will have to pass in the last instance on the bill under consideration if it becomes a law, would be pushed aside by the citation of cases where unfair competition has been applied to substitution practices. It seems to me unbelievable that the United States Supreme Court would be led away from this solemn and deliberate decision and this use of precise language in one of the most important cases that it has ever decided.

Another case I wish to quote from is Ware-Kramer Tobacco Co. v. American Tobacco Co. (180 Fed. Rep., 160; Circuit Court Eastern District of North Carolina).

This was an action under section 7 of the Sherman Antitrust Act to recover threefold damages for injury to the plaintiff's business.

The case arose on demurrer to the complaint. The court overruled the demurrer.

The opinion of the court, by Judge Connor, states, page 165:

Whether, under the language of the statute, the members of the illegal combination or the conspiracy may, in the prosecution of their business, resort to the legal methods open to those who are living in obedience to the law, with immunity from an action for injuries inflicted upon the business or property of others—that is, resort to fair competition—has not, so far as the industry of counsel has revealed, been decided. The position of the plaintiff is that the unlawful combination and its members are "outlaws" and not within the pale of the protection conferred upon those who pursue a lawful calling in a lawful way.

At page 166:

The theory upon which the complaint is drawn is that defendants, being an unlawful combination within the terms of the statute, in furtherance of its general plan, scheme, or purpose to restrain all interstate trade in manufactured tobacco and cigarettes, and to monopolize the manufacture and sale of tobacco, first resorted to unfair and oppressive means, fully set out, to prevent its (Ware-Kramer Tobacco Co.'s) organization.

I call the attention of the Senate to this quotation particularly because it sets forth many different sorts of competition which are intended to be prohibited by the pending bill.

Quoting, then, at page 167:

Plaintiff alleges that during the years named defendants, by the means aforesaid and other means, such as maintaining a close watch and espionage upon plaintiff's shipments, maintaining a system of spies upon such shipments from the depot at Wilson, N. C., and communicating same to the defendant's officers, both in New York and Wilson, sending the representatives to different customers of plaintiff, and by threats, promises, and inducements many of plaintiff's customers were unlawfully and unfairly taken from them. That this systematic espionage upon and interference with plaintiff's business continued until it was compelled to move to Norfolk, Va., to escape the same.

Plaintiff sets forth, among others, the following means resorted to by defendants to interfere with and restrain their trade: Using coupons in an unfair manner; selling cigarettes at and below the cost of production; paying jobbers extra discounts in territory where plaintiff's cigarettes were selling well; giving jobbers and dealers free goods to induce them to press the sale of their goods as against plaintiff's goods, and by requiring dealers not to handle plaintiff's goods; by interfering with the labor of independent manufacturers; by making jobbers and dealers afraid to keep exposed to view or on their shelves where they could be seen the goods of plaintiff, for fear the American Tobacco Co. would injure the business of such dealer or jobber; by making jobbers and dealers afraid to advertise plaintiff's goods; by the refusal of the American Tobacco Co. to sell to and by purposely delaying the shipment and delivery of goods ordered by jobbers and dealers who sold or advertised the goods of plaintiff.

Plaintiff, in addition to the foregoing, alleges specifically: That, during the year 1905, it received a proposition from a cigarette dealer in China to manufacture for him a large number of cigarettes for the Chinese trade. That plaintiff made for said customer a large order for cigarettes, which were shipped as directed, accepted, and paid for. That said order promised to furnish a market for at least 7,000,000 cigarettes a month. That the vice president of defendant, by means of the espionage aforesaid, ascertained that plaintiff had received said order and made said shipment, and immediately communicated with one of its employees, giving him directions to ascertain to what port these goods were shipped and the name of the consignee. "If you can not learn the name, perhaps you can find out the markings on the case"; concluding, "A carload means to us about 5,000,000 cigarettes. If we get this information, I think we can shut off their market." That this information was obtained and the market was "shut off," to plaintiff's great damage. Finally, plaintiff alleges: That defendant W. M. Carter was in the employment of defendant American Tobacco Co. for some time prior to the year 1909. That during the year 1908 he proposed to take a block of stock in plaintiff company, representing that he was an expert salesman and was thoroughly familiar with the cigarette trade and could sell large quantities of plaintiff's goods. That plaintiff's officers accepted the proposition of defendant Carter, and he took 30 shares of its stock and was made manager of plaintiff's sales department and entered upon his duties during the month of February, 1909, and continued to draw his salary until October 1, 1909. That after becoming manager of plaintiff's sales department "he purposely and willfully so managed the sales department of said business as to greatly decrease and injure the business of said company. He transferred salesmen from territory in which they were acquainted and were selling goods to other territory in which they were strangers," etc. Plaintiff alleges many other wrongful and injurious acts of defendant W. M. Carter, all of which, it avers, injured its business. That from various facts and circumstances, plaintiffs have reason to believe, and therefore allege, that the said W. M. Carter was working in the interest of and carrying out the plans and scheme of the defendant American Tobacco Co., while he was drawing his salary from the Ware-Kramer Tobacco Co., and that his conduct and work, as alleged in the complaint herein, was the work and acts of the defendants, and had for their purpose the injury and destruction of Ware-Kramer Tobacco Co. and its elimination as a competitor of the defendant.

Now, here was a case as far removed as possible from the ordinary cases of substitution or "palming off," a case that describes in detail a great many practices that the pending act is meant to prohibit. I wish to read further from the opinion to show that the court considered these offenses as unfair competition and used the term. Quoting, therefore, from page 169, I read:

Conceding all that is claimed by defendants in regard to what is fair competition in business, the limits of which have not been very definitely fixed, it is clear that, eliminating all doubtful averments, sufficient allegation remains, admitted by the demurrer, to place the acts of the defendants beyond the limits of fair competition.

* * * * * * *

It requires no argument to show that the course of conduct pursued by defendants toward the Ware-Kramer Tobacco Co. from the moment its projectors conceived the idea of bringing it into corporate existence, through its struggle to take upon itself the form and features of organic life, and while, in defiance of the efforts of defendants to throttle its activities, it maintained an existence with promise of success, were calculated and intended not only to restrain but to destroy it. While it may be that some one or more of the "things done," as set out in the complaint were in and of themselves within the limits of "fair competition," they are, as said by Mr. Justice Holmes, "bound together as the parts of a single whole. The plan may make the parts unlawful." No argument is required to show that the scheme was intended to restrain the interstate trade of plaintiff, and that it "brought that result to pass." While it is true that "fair competition is the life of trade," it is equally true that "unfair and excessive competition" is death to trade—of all competition—followed by the establishment of "monopoly," which My Lord Coke defines to be:

"An institution or allowance to any person or persons, bodies politic or incorporate, of or for the sole buying, selling, making, working, or using anything whereby any person, or persons, bodies politic or corporate are sought to be constrained of any freedom or liberty that they had before, or hindered in their lawful trade."

And which our Constitution, from 1776 to the present day, declares to be "contrary to the genius of free state and ought not to be allowed." (Const. N. C., art. 1, par. 31.)

The demurrer must be overruled.

I refer also to another case, which defines "competition," set forth in People's Tobacco Co. v. American Tobacco Co. (170 Fed. Rep., 396; Circuit Court of Appeals, fifth circuit).

The next case is an Iowa case.

JUDICIAL INTERPRETATION OF "UNFAIR COMPETITION" BY STATE COURTS.

In State v. Fairmont Creamery Co. (153 Iowa, 703), where the question was as to the constitutionality of an Iowa statute prohibiting unfair competition by purchasing at higher prices in one locality than in others, with intent to injure or destroy a competitior, the supreme court, by Evans, judge, said:

One of the great legislative problems of the day is to protect fair competition in the business world without unduly interfering with the freedom of contract. We may properly presume that the problem is greater in some lines of business than in others. In the purchase of commodities, the methods of business adopted are quite as various as the different commodities. Methods are adopted which are peculiar and limited to dealings in a certain commodity. Evil practices, therefore, may arise in the business methods pertaining to one commodity which do not obtain at all in relation to other commodities. Practices may obtain which contravene no statute, and which, nevertheless, would be deemed as morally dishonest and detrimental to the public interest. * * * The temporary maintenance of artificial prices for the sole purpose of destroying a weak competitor and creating a monopoly is one of the modern evil inventions.

That case shows clearly how useless, how futile, it would be to undertake to define all the different unfair practices that we wish to prohibit.

In In re Greene (52 Fed. Rep., 104), indictment for violation of Sherman Antitrust Act, at page 116, Judge Howell E. Jackson, afterwards a justice of the United States Supreme Court, discussing the meaning of the term "monopoly," said:

When this section of the act was under consideration in the Senate, distinguished members of its Judiciary Committee and lawyers of great ability explained what they understood the term "monopoly" to mean, one of them saying, "It is the sole engrossing to a man's self by means which prevent other men from engaging in fair competition with him."

There is the use of the term "fair competition" in its ordinary sense, and of course "unfair competition" would go with it.

In United States v. Whiting (212 Fed. Rep., 466 (Mass.), Mar. 23, 1914), indictment for violation of Sherman Act, Judge Morton said, at page 478:

An attempt to monopolize means an attempt to get control of the industry in which the defendant is engaged by means which prevent other men from engaging in fair competition with him.

In United States v. American Naval Stores Co. (172 Fed. Rep., 455) at page 459. Sheppard, district judge, charging jury, said:

The size of business and the gaining of business popularity, fair dealing, sagacity, foresight and honest business methods, even if it should result in acquiring the business of competitors, would not make an illegal monopoly. It is the acquisition and use of unfair and illegal power in defeating competition which makes such illegal monopoly.

See also Dueber Watch Case Manufacturing Co. v. E. Howard Watch & Clock Co. (66 Fed. Rep., 637, at p. 639; C. C. A., second circuit).

I have now discussed certain cases which use the terms "unfair competition" and "fair competition" in the exact sense for which we are contending in the pending bill. I now come to some decrees of the Federal court where the term "unfair competition" is used. It is well known to every lawyer that there is no part of a lawsuit which is so important and where the language is so carefully used as in the decree of the court at the end of an equity proceeding.

DECREES OF FEDERAL COURTS IN CASES UNDER THE SHERMAN ANTITRUST ACT WHERE THERE WAS NO QUESTION AS TO FRAUDULENT IMITATION OF TRADE-MARKS OR TRADE NAMES.

Decree in United States v. Central West Publishing Co. et al. (District Court of the United States, Northern District of Illinois), entered August 3, 1912.—The decree specifically restrains the use of numerous unfair methods of unfair competition.

Subdivision 5 of clause 2 of the decree restrains the defendants—

From threatening the competitors of either of these defendants that they must either cease competing with defendants or sell out to one or the other of the defendants herein, and from threatening that, unless they do, their industries will be destroyed by the establishment of near-by plants to actively compete with them, or by any other method of unfair competition.

There we have the exact words of the pending bill—"any other method of unfair competition"; and it is any method of "unfair competition" that this bill proposes to prohibit. In clause 3 of the same decree there is this provision:

That the defendants, Western Newspaper Union, Western Newspaper Union of New York, Central West Publishing Co., George A. Joslyn, John F. Cramer, H. H. Fish, and M. H. McMullen, be, and they are hereby, permanently enjoined from either directly or indirectly, by themselves or through their agents or employees, from in any manner continuing to do any acts in unfair competition against the other defendant company, * * * to wit, American Press Association.

There we have the term "unfair competition" again used in the precise sense for which we contend.

Decree in United States v. General Electric Co. (Circuit Court for Northern District of Ohio, Eastern Division), entered October 12, 1911.—The decree specifically restrains the defendant from using a number of unfair methods of competition. At the end of the eighth clause the following proviso is found:

And provided that nothing in this decree shall be taken in any respect to enjoin or restrain fair, free, and open competition.

United States v. American Tobacco Co. (221 U. S., 106, 181).—The court, by Mr. Chief Justice White, said that the history of the combination was—demonstrative of the existence from the beginning of a purpose to acquire dominion and control of the tobacco trade, not by the mere exertion of the ordinary right to contract and to trade, but by methods devised in order to monopolize the trade by driving competitors out of business, which were ruthlessly carried out upon the assumption that to work upon the fears or play upon the cupidity of competitors would make success possible.

The evidence, the Chief Justice said, justified—the inference that the intention existed to use the power of the combination as a vantage ground to further monopolize the trade in tobacco by means of trade conflicts designed to injure others, either by driving competitors out of the business or compelling them to become parties to a combination.

The term "unfair competition" is used by Attorneys General Wickersham and McReynolds in the papers that were drawn and filed in the Supreme Court. One of them was read the other day by the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], but I refer to some others. The first is in the Standard Oil Co. v. The United States (221 U. S., 28 and 29).

Argument for the United States by the Attorney General and Mr. Frank Kellogg:

> We believe that the defendants have acquired a monopoly by means of a combination of the principal manufacturing concerns, through a holding company; that they have, by reason of the very size of the combination, been able to maintain this monopoly through unfair methods of competition, discriminatory freight rates, and other means set forth in the proof (p. 28).
> Evidence that the defendant companies obtained rebates and discriminatory rates in the transportation of their product as against their competitors, and engaged in unfair and oppressive methods of competition, thereby destroying the smaller manufacturers and dealers throughout the country, is material in this case (p. 29).

United States v. American Tobacco Co. (221 U. S., 106)—Argument for United States.—The Attorney General and Mr. James C. McReynolds, before he was Attorney General, used this language, on page 122:

> Moreover, if important, the evidence clearly establishes that the defendant's actions have been characterized by duress and unfair and oppressive methods, and that following a fixed plan they have sought to suppress competition and secure monopolies.

Economists use the term "unfair competition" as descriptive of the methods employed for destroying competition for the purpose of obtaining monopoly. This is shown by the two following articles: "Unfair competition," by Prof. William S. Stevens, in the Political Science Quarterly for June, 1914, and "The trust problem," by E. Dana Durand, in the Quarterly Journal of Economics for May, 1914.

Other articles and textbooks will be cited a little further on. I feel that this conflict which has arisen in the Senate over the precise meaning of the words "unfair competition" is entirely academic. If the junior Senator from Missouri is right in his claim that the words "unfair competition" have a peculiar and limited meaning applicable only to cases of the substitution of one man's goods for another's—and I am free to say that he cites many authorities that point in that direction, although none of them is conclusive—it is very easy to separate the two words "unfair" and "competition," so that they will not become mixed with the particular sort of methods that he complains of. It would be very easy to make the operation of this act certain by specifying that "unfair or oppressive competition" is prohibited, or that "unfair methods of competition" are prohibited, or that "unfair or oppressive methods of competition" are prohibited. Therefore, unless the friends of the bill feel that they are committed and can not conscientiously abandon any word or line of it, I suggest—and I hope the chairman of the committee will consider the suggestion and agree to it—that the words "unfair" and "competition" be separated by some word that will not do them any harm, such as "oppressive" or "methods of," so that there will not be the particular label that has been attached in many cases to offenses such as substituting one man's goods for another.

I also wish to suggest to the chairman that it might be wise to insert on page 21, line 10, after the word "act," the words "or by the antitrust acts," so as to be sure that the practices defined by the courts as prohibited by the antitrust acts may surely be included.

Mr. NEWLANDS. On what page is that?

Mr. HOLLIS. Page 21, line 10. I will speak to the chairman of the committee about that later.

Fear has been expressed that in some mysterious way the trade commission act may deprive litigants of their recourse to the courts under the present practice, but no precedent is cited, no argument is presented to justify that fear. The Sherman Antitrust Act is left in full force and vigor; the courts are left with powers unimpaired. The trade commission act simply provides an additional remedy supplemental to those now existing, more elastic and more efficacious.

In fact, the commission will be auxiliary to the courts; it will be composed of men fulfilling the functions of a high office, just like the judges of our courts; and its services will be honest, impartial, and high minded, just like the services of our courts. In fact, as I read the bill, and as I understand it, nothing can be done to compel any man to obey this commission without recourse to the courts, so that the courts must furnish the sanction to carry out the orders that seem proper to the commission.

From the speeches delivered by the Senator from Missouri on three separate days I begin to suspect that he fears that the bill will work more certainly and more effectively than he is now willing to admit.

He began, as we have seen, by stating his opposition to government by commission. With any man's statement on that proposition I have no quarrel, because it is difficult for Democrats who have been brought up on the idea of strict construction and State rights to concede to the Federal Government all the authority that seems to be necessary to cope with industrial monopoly. I grudge it; I do not want to go a bit further than is necessary; but when, in order to carry out the first cause of the Democratic Party, namely, the protection of the masses of the people from the aggressions of the few, the powerful few—whenever, in order to carry out that purpose of the Democratic Party, it is necessary to cede to the Federal Government power enough to do the job, then, Mr. President, I am for it; but I have no quarrel with those who are not willing to go to that length at present. But the distinguished Senator followed up this statement by claiming that the law was unconstitutional, because it delegated to the commission the powers of Congress to make laws. He then claimed that the words "unfair competition" meant nothing, that no court had defined the term. And finally he claimed that the term "unfair competition" had a very precise and limited meaning which would limit the operation of the act far more than its author intends.

No doubt the able Senator is opposed to the establishment of a trade commission. But if the law as passed proves unconstitutional, or if it is so vague on the one hand or so precise on the other that it will permit the commission to deal with none of the evils its author intends it to reach, then the Senator should be satisfied, for according to his positive assertions it will be void and of no effect, and therefore will do no harm. According to the Senator the purpose of the bill will certainly fail. What more can any sincere opponent of commissions ask?

But the Senator's vigorous denunciation of the bill, his protests against its passage, his appeals to the friends of the bill to make it perfect, and his refusal to suggest any phrase that will make it perfect, lead to the irresistible conclusion that the Senator knows only too well how effective it will prove.

Why should the opponent of the commission complain because it grants no power to the commission? Why should he not be content with a measure that gives them no power? Why should one who objects to place any weapon in the hands of the commission complain that the lance provided is nothing but a mullen stalk?

The conviction grows, Mr. President, that the bill provided by the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee is altogether too effective to suit the Senator from Missouri.

I now want to analyze somewhat at length the provisions of the bill, what they are supposed to accomplish, and what I believe they will accomplish. Section 5 reads as follows——

Mr. COLT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. HOLLIS. I do.

Mr. COLT. May I ask the Senator a question for information merely?

Mr. HOLLIS. Yes.

Mr. COLT. Why are the words "unfair competition" used instead of the words "restraint of trade" or "attempt at monopoly"? What is it intended to cover by the phrase "unfair competition" that is not already covered by the words of the antitrust act?

Mr. HOLLIS. If the Senator will pardon me, I have already declined to be interrupted by one Senator. I cover that point fully a little later; and I would rather not be diverted now.

Section 5 of the pending bill reads as follows:

> SEC. 5. That unfair competition in commerce is hereby declared unlawful.
>
> The commission is hereby empowered and directed to prevent corporations from using unfair methods of competition in commerce.
> Whenever the commission shall have reason to believe that any corporation has been or is using any unfair method of competition in commerce it shall issue and serve upon such corporation a written order, at least 30 days in advance of the time set therein for hearing, directing it to appear before the commission and show cause why an order shall not be issued by the commission restraining and prohibiting it from using such method of competition, and if upon such hearing the commission shall find that the method of competition in question is prohibited by this act it shall thereupon issue an order restraining and prohibiting the use of the same. The commission may at any time modify or set aside, in whole or in part, any order issued by it under this act.
> Whenever the commission, after the issuance of such order, shall find that such corporation has not complied therewith the commission may petition the district court of the United States, within any district where the method in question was used or where such corporation is located or carries on business, praying the court to issue an injunction to enforce such order of the commission; and the court is hereby authorized to issue such injunction.

This, as I understand, is the only section of the bill that has been seriously attacked. The section may be analyzed thus:

(a) Congress lays down a general rule of action under which the commission shall proceed, namely, that unfair competition in commerce is unlawful.

(b) The commission is empowered and directed to apply this rule to particular situations and circumstances, with a view to making orders in particular cases within the rule laid down by Congress.

(c) The orders of the commission are not final. If not acquiesced in they can be enforced only by the courts after judicial review of the proceedings before the commission.

Now, as to the evil to be corrected through the action of the commission under section 5.

The numerous cases which have been decided under the Sherman Act have established beyond doubt that the only effective means of building up and maintaining monopoly, where there is no control of a natural resource or of transportation, is the use of unfair competition.

Fair competition is competition which is successful through superior efficiency. Competition is unfair when it resorts to methods which shut out competitors who, by reason of their efficiency, might otherwise be able to continue in business and prosper. Without the use of unfair methods no corporation can grow beyond the limits imposed upon it by the necessity of being as efficient as any competitor. The mere size of a corporation which maintains its position solely through superior efficiency is ordinarily no menace to the public interest.

The object of section 5 is to prevent the creation or continuance of monopoly through unfair methods.

I will say to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], who sought to interrupt me, that I have now reached the point concerning which he wished to ask me a question.

The Sherman Antitrust Act does not become effective until a monopoly is full grown, in full panoply, so that you can prove to the court that is is a monopoly and is in restraint of trade; but if the proposed trade commission has its attention called to some unfair method of competition, it can immediately investigate, and if it decides that it is unfair competition and may lead to monopoly or restraint of trade, it may prohibit it; and then the court will come in and put that prohibition into effect.

It may be urged that the Sherman Act sufficiently protects the public in this regard. This is not true, for the following reasons:

The Sherman Act applies only to restraint of trade by a combination and to monopolization of commerce. Unfair competition is a means of restraining or of monopolizing trade. But there may be some doubt as to whether the mere use of an unfair method, without more, by a corporation of no conspicuous size, would be held to fall within the scope of the Sherman Act.

At all events, the Department of Justice, with its manifold other activities, has not in the past brought suit under the Sherman Act, and probably will not do so, except in cases of great magnitude involving what appear to be very clear violations of the act. In such suits the Attorney General usually alleges the use of unfair competitive practices in support of his main contention that a monopoly exists which ought to be dissolved. The injunction against the future use of such practices is only an incidental part of the decree. Countless competitors succumb before relief is finally obtained.

The Department of Justice deals with monopoly as an accomplished fact. It did not attack the Oil Trust or the Tobacco Trust until after they had destroyed competition and obtained monopoly of the markets. If a trade commission, armed with the power to prevent unfair competition, had existed when the founders of the Tobacco Trust began to carry out their calculated policy of exterminating competitors, that astoundingly successful attempt to monopolize could have been frustrated. Instead of merely terminating an illegal condition after harm has been done, the trade commission will prevent not only the infliction of harm but also the monopoly to which that harm would have led.

We have a conspicuous example of the need of such legislation as is proposed by the pending bill in the result of the Harvester Trust case in Missouri. The courts of Missouri found that the Harvester Trust was an illegal restraint of trade under the Missouri statutes, and they enjoined the Harvester Trust from doing any more business in Missouri. The result was that the Missouri farmers could not buy any farm machinery, and the State had to enter into a trade with the Harvester Trust to allow them to violate that decree or to change the decree sufficiently so that they could get in machines enough to enable the farmers to do business. So that the Sherman Antitrust Act or any act that prohibits restraint of trade or abolishes monopoly may come in too late, after all the other competitors have been killed off, and when, if you drive the trust out of the State, you can not get any goods.

The pending bill is aimed to nip those practices in the bud, to begin as early as these very spry and active gentlemen themselves begin. There is no danger that we will get too much law or too efficient law to keep up with this class of merchants; and, as is suggested by the chairman of the committee [Mr. NEWLANDS], it is done to preserve the lives of the small competitors, so that when you have got all the monopoly out of the way the little fellows are there to do business.

The commission, by reason of its knowledge of business affairs and the concentrated attention it will give thereto, its facilities for investigation, its rapid, summary procedure, will be able to protect business against unfair competition in much more effective and timely fashion than the Department of Justice can do.

The Department of Justice, on the other hand, will be relieved of a load of burdensome work which it is not well fitted to perform. It will be able to give its main attention to the great task of prosecuting suits for the dissolution of monopolies, leaving to the trade commission the important service of policing competition, so as to protect small business men, keep an open field for new enterprise, and prevent the development of trusts.

THE METHOD PROVIDED IN SECTION 5 IS THE BEST METHOD OF CORRECTING THE EVIL OF UNFAIR COMPETITION.

One of the great issues in the last presidential compaign was whether the solution of the trust problem was to be found in the regulation of monopoly or in the regulation of competition. The Democratic Party declared itself for the abolition of monopoly and the regulation of competition. The regulation of competition means the prevention of competition that destroys for the purpose of gaining monopoly, and so is harmful to the public—the prevention, in short, of unfair competition. The Sherman Act is adequate for the abolition of monopoly; it is, however, but imperfectly adequate for the regulation of competition. The present Congress is charged with the duty of supplying the defect in the law.

Two ways of regulating competition have been proposed. One is the method provided in section 5 of this bill. The other is to define, one by one, the various unfair practices, and to make each one a criminal offense.

The objections to the latter method are many and conclusive, and this is important, because, as I understand, it is here that the members of the Interstate Commerce Committee and the members of the Judiciary Committee disagree. Let me state a few of them:

(a) It is impossible to frame a set of definitions which embrace all unfair practices. The best we can do is to define those which we know to be unlawful from the decisions and decrees of the courts under the Sherman Act. The list of these is so formidable that no draftsman has yet ventured to enumerate more than a small fraction of them in any bill introduced in Congress. It is almost like trying to define "citizen" by giving the name of every citizen in the United States. But if they were all defined and prohibited under severe penalties it would at once be necessary to begin over again. The number and variety of unfair practices is as unlimited and inexhaustible as the wit of man. Judge Evans, of the Iowa Supreme Court, has well described them as "modern evil inventions." How can you define the scope of human inventiveness? With each new invention there would arise a public demand for Congress to make a new definition and prohibition. It is the experience of all who have had to do with legislation that after you have had a long struggle over any great bill, whether it is a tariff bill or a currency bill or a trust bill, it is very difficut to get it up again within a few years and to find the enthusiasm that will lift it over the obstacles that stand in the way of amendment or reenactment. If Congress adopts the method of definition it will undertake an endless task. Compare such a cumbrous, imperfect method with the elastic, comprehensive Sherman Act, which, as Chief Justice White has said, by generic designation embraces "every conceivable act which could conceivably come within the spirit or purpose of the prohibition of the law, without regard to the garb in which such acts were clothed." Men have urged in favor of the policy of definition that business men do not understand the law and need to be enlightened. This contention was well founded three years ago, but now that the later decisions and decrees have clarified the law it is no longer heard. In order to be informed as fully as Congress can inform them, business men have only to read the decrees of the courts in cases which have arisen under the Sherman Act.

I might say here that the distinguished senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] the other day said in his remarks that every man knew when he was committing a fraud, and he gave some illustrations to show that. So every man knows perfectly well when he is engaging in unfair competition. Men who can not draw the distinction between right and wrong get into jail very early in their careers. We have quite effective machinery for them, because they are little fellows.

(b) It is practically impossible to define unfair practices so that the definition will fit business of every sort in every part of this country. Whether competition is unfair or not depends in a peculiar degree upon the surrounding circumstances of the particular case. What is harmful under certain circumstances may be beneficial under different circumstances.

If you make a rigid definition applicable to everybody in the whole United States, you will stop some things which you would choose under some circumstances to encourage if you could only look far enough into the unknown, and some things which you would like to stop will slip through the meshes of your definition. The definitions in the Clayton bill which the House has passed are subject to this criticism.

(c) It would be impossible to frame definitions without using language which would present very difficult problems of construction to the courts. One has only to read the definitions in the Clayton bill to be convinced of this, or to read the descriptions of unfair methods of competition in the court decrees and then imagine how complicated the definitions of these same methods would be if the language of the decrees were altered and qualified so as to have a universal application instead of applying to a particular business. The definitions would give rise to a long series of litigated cases continuing until the new language had all been judicially construed. Instead of being clarified, the law would be obscured.

(d) A definition once enacted can never be adapted so as to meet the requirements of a particular situation. An order of a commission or a court decree, on the other hand, is flexible. Orders of the commission issued under section 5 may be modified or set aside and the courts retain jurisdiction of their decrees for the purpose of modification. In the very recent decree dissolving the Thread Trust it is ordered that—

> Jurisdiction of this cause be, and is hereby, retained for the purpose of enforcing this decree and for the purpose of enabling the parties to apply to the court for modification hereof if it be hereafter shown to the satisfaction of the court that by reason of changed conditions or changes in the statute law of the United States the provisions hereof have become inappropriate or inadequate to maintain competitive conditions in interstate or foreign sewing-thread trade in the United States or have become unduly oppressive to the defendants and are no longer necessary to secure or maintain competitive conditions in such interstate and foreign trade.

No such discriminative molding of the law to changing conditions will be possible in case the method of defining unfair practices should be adopted.

ADVANTAGES TO BUSINESS OF THE METHOD PROVIDED IN SECTION 5 FOR PREVENTING UNFAIR COMPETITION.

Nobody defends unfair competition. The Senator from Missouri is as much opposed to unfair competition as any of us. He calls it a rascally practice; and that is a good, vigorous description of it. Only the pirates of business, who desire monopoly, have an interest in its continuance. Everybody else wants to have it stopped. The only question is as to the best way of stopping it with the least risk to legitimate business operations. My belief is that if a vote could be taken it would be found that American business men are almost unanimously in favor of committing the duty of preventing unfair competition to the trade commission, under the wise restrictions provided in section 5 of this bill. The board of directors of the United States Chamber of Commerce at a meeting held in Washington a few days ago took favorable action in regard to section 5 by authorizing the sending of a special bulletin to the members of the chamber explaining the section and pointing out its merits.

One has only to consider what would happen in the actual working under section 5 in order to see why it would be acceptable to all business men, except those who wish to monopolize, especially to the small business men who are the victims of unfair competition. Let us suppose that the commission in the course of its investigations finds a corporation using what it regards as an unfair method of competition. The first thing the commission will do will be to call the matter to the attention of the managers of the corporation. There will then take place a full, informal discussion between the commission and the managers. The managers will have every opportunity to explain and persuade the commission, if they can, that the method of competition is fair; and the commission, on its part, will present its views. Should neither party convince the other, the commission will then hold a formal hearing, at which the corporation will offer testimony and will be represented by counsel. If at the close of the hearing the commission abides by its original opinion, it will declare that the method of competition in question is unfair, and will issue an order that the same be discontinued. The corporation will then have the choice either to obey the order or to disregard it. If the order is disregarded, no penalty will be incurred. All that the commission can do will be to present the case to a Federal court, which will then decide in the regular course whether the order of the commission is just, and if it is so decided, will enforce the order by proper process.

The corporation will thus have three chances to protect itself against arbitrary or unjust action: First, in the informal discussion with the commission; secondly, upon the hearing before the commission; and, thirdly, in the suit in court. Doubtful cases probably will always go to a court and be judicially adjudicated and determined. The function of the commission will be to act as an administrative agency to see that the law is applied and enforced, and in this respect it will be precisely like the Interstate Commerce Commission. The court in performing its judicial function will have the very important benefit of an investigation such as no court has the facilities for making, and of findings by a commission composed of men whose judgment on a question of business practice, by reason of their comprehensive knowledge and experience of business, will be entitled to great weight. The court will doubtless ascribe to these findings, as the Supreme Court has said in speaking of the Interstate Commerce Commission, "the strength due to the judgments of a tribunal appointed by law and informed by experience." (Interstate Commerce Commission v. Union Pacific R. R., 222 U. S., at p. 541.) We must not lose sight of another advantage to men in a small way of business. Such men are timid. They fear to incur the hostility of great corporations. In one of the cases I have read to the Senate the customers of the plaintiff were afraid to put the plaintiff's goods on their shelves. They were afraid the American Tobacco Co. would see them there and punish them. Such men can not afford the expense of long-drawn-out legal proceedings, carried from one court to another. It will be an inestimable boon to them to have a strong arm of the Government come to their rescue and, in the public interest, bear the expense of the contest.

OBJECTIONS RAISED AGAINST SECTION 5 AND ANSWERS THERETO.

Those who oppose section 5 have argued (a) that its provisions are unconstitutional; (b) that the term "unfair competition" has no certain legal meaning; (c) that orders of the commission will not be subject to review by a court, so that business will be exposed to the arbitrary judgments of five "irresponsible" commissioners; (d) that the task imposed upon the commission is so vast that it can not be performed and the commission will break down; (e) that the action of the commission under this section will be used as a buffer in prosecutions under the Sherman law, and will put business in a straitjacket. Let us consider these objections in order:

(a) The constitutionality of the section is assailed on the ground that it involves a delegation of legislative power. This question is no longer open. The Supreme Court has considered the arguments urged against section 5 in cases that go much further than this bill proposes to go and has rejected them as unsound.

The rule of law which the trade commission will administer is the rule declaring unfair competition to be unlawful. In enacting that rule Congress will clearly indicate the result it desires to bring about; and in enforcing the rule, so as to bring about the result pointed out by the statute, the commission will exercise administrative and not legislative power. This is absolutely established by the decisions. The cases in point have been referred to in the Senate and are to be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. They are as follows:

Field v. Clark (143 U. S., 649).
In re Kollock (165 U. S., 526).
Butterfield v. Stranahan (192 U. S., 470).
Union Bridge Co. v. United States (204 U. S., 364).
St. Louis & Iron Mountain Railway v. Taylor (210 U. S., 281, 287).
Monongahela Bridge Co. v. United States (216 U. S., 177).
United States v. Grimaud (220 U. S., 506).
Interstate Commerce Commission v. Goodrich Transit Co. (224 U. S., 194).
Kansas City Southern Railway v. United States (231 U. S., 423).

In Butterfield against Stranahan, supra, the rule laid down by Congress made it unlawful to import tea inferior to certain standards. The Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to establish the standards and to enforce the rule. The court held that in performing his duties under the act the Secretary of the Treasury exercised executive and not legislative power. The court said:

> Congress legislated on the subject as far as was reasonably necessary, and from the necessities of the case was compelled to leave to executive officials the duty of bringing about the result pointed out by the statute.

In Interstate Commerce Commission against Goodrich Transit Co., supra, the court said:

The Congress may not delegate its purely legislative power to a commission, but having laid down the general rules of action under which a commission shall proceed it may require of that commission the application of such rules to particular situations and the investigation of facts with a view to making orders in a particular matter within the rules laid down by Congress.

The power given by this bill to the trade commission to administer the rule against unfair competition is analogous to the power given to the Interstate Commerce Commission to administer the rule laid down in section 3 of the act to regulate commerce which makes it unlawful to give undue or unreasonable preferences or advantages. It is also precisely analogous to the power conferred on the Interstate Commerce Commission in section 15 of the act to regulate commerce to comple the discontinuance of unjust or unreasonable or unjustly discriminatory or unduly preferential or prejudicial classifications, regulations, or practices and to prescribe what classification, regulation, or practice is just, fair, and reasonable, to be thereafter followed.

(b) It is urged that the term "unfair competition" is too vague, that it has no certain meaning in the law. The answer to this objection is that it is not necessary that the meaning should be completely ascertained. There are many terms in the law, such as fraud and negligence, whose meaning is constantly being extended. Certainly "unfair competition" has a better ascertained meaning than the terms "unjust or unreasonable or unjustly discriminatory, or unduly preferential or prejudicial classifications, regulations, or practices," had when section 15 of the act to regulate commerce was first enacted. As a matter of fact, "unfair competition" is a term which has an unusually definite legal meaning. The courts have no difficulty at all in dealing with this term. As I have previously stated, in Standard Oil Co. v. United States (221 U. S.), at pages 42–43, the court, by Mr. Chief Justice White, said:

Without attempting to follow the elaborate averments on these subjects, spread over 57 pages of the printed record, it suffices to say that such averments may properly be grouped under the following heads: Rebates, preferences, and other discriminatory practices in favor of the combination by railroad companies; restraint and monopolization by control of pipe lines, and unfair practices against competing pipe lines; contracts with competitors in restraint of trade; unfair methods of competition, such as local price cutting at the points where necessary to suppress competition, espionage, of the business competitors, the operation of bogus independent companies, and payments of rebates on oil, with the like intent.

In State v. Fairmont Creamery Co. (153 Iowa, 702), at pages 709–710, the court, by Evans, judge, said:

One of the great legislative problems of the day is to protect fair competition in the business world without unduly interfering with the freedom of contract. We may properly presume that the problem is greater in some lines of business than in others. In the purchase of commodities the methods of business adopted are quite as various as the different commodities. Methods are adopted which are peculiar and limited to dealings in a certain commodity. Evil practices, therefore, may arise in the business methods pertaining to one commodity which do not obtain at all in relation to other commodities. Practices may obtain which contravene no statute and which, nevertheless, would be deemed as morally dishonest and detrimental to the public interest. * * * The temporary maintenance of artificial prices for the sole purpose of destroying a weak competitor and creating a monopoly is one of the modern evil inventions.

Many States have enacted laws prohibiting unfair competition. A typical instance is a Nebraska statute entitled "An act to prohibit unfair commercial discrimination between different sections, communities, or localities, or unfair competition, and providing penalties therefor.

Can anyone imagine that the Nebraska courts have had any difficulty in deciding that "unfair competition" means just what it says, without being limited to the particular acts of substitution of goods?

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. HOLLIS. If the Senator will pardon me, I shall be through pretty soon. I have refused to be interrupted.

Mr. STERLING. The only inquiry I wish to make——

Mr. HOLLIS. I should be glad to yield ordinarily, but——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. HOLLIS. Similar statutes are found in New Jersey, South Dakota, Minnesota, Iowa, and other States. Chapter 210, Laws of 1913, State of New Jersey, is entitled "An act to prevent unfair competition and unfair trade practices." See also State v. Drayton (82 Nebr., 254), State v. Standard Oil Co. Chapter No. 210, Laws of 1913, State of New Jersey:

An act to prevent unfair competition and unfair trade practices.

1. It shall be unlawful for any merchant, firm, or corporation, for the purpose of attracting trade for other goods, to appropriate for his or their own ends a name, brand, trade-mark, reputation, or good will of any maker in whose product said merchant, firm, or corporation deals, or to discriminate against the same by depreciating the value of such products in the public mind, or by misrepresentation as to value or quality, or by price inducement, or by unfair discrimination between buyers, or in any other manner whatsoever, except in cases where said goods do not carry any notice prohibiting such practice, and excepting in case of a receiver's sale of a sale by a concern going out of business.

Laws of Nebraska, 1907, chapter 157. Act entitled:

An act to prohibit unfair commercial discrimination between different sections, communities, or localities, or unfair competition, and providing penalties therefor.

Similar statutes are found in Minnesota, Iowa, South Dakota, and other States.

Then we come to an act in Australia, which I call attention to because of the very illuminating remarks made in reference to the statute by the chief justice of the high court of Australia. This is the Australian industries-preservation act of 1906, as amended by the acts of 1907, 1909, and 1910:

REPRESSION OF MONOPOLIES.

4. (1) Any person who, either as principal or as agent, makes or enters into any contract, or is or continues to be a member of or engages in any combination in relation to trade or commerce with other countries or among the States (a) in restraint of or with intent to restrain trade or commerce, or (b) to the destruction or injury of or with intent to destroy or injure by means of unfair competition any Australian industry the preservation of which is advantageous to the Commonwealth, having due regard to the interests of producers, workers, and consumers, is guilty of an offense.

* * * * * * *

6. (1) For the purpose of section 4 and section 10 of this act, unfair competition means competition which is unfair in the circumstances.

The remarks by Judge Isaacs which put this whole matter of "unfair competition" in a very lucid way are as follows:

In the case of The King and the Attorney General of the Commonwealth v. Associated Northern Collieries (14 Commonwealth Law Reports, 387), the high court, by Isaacs, judge, said at page 473:

The act under which these proceedings are taken, as I have already pointed out, indicates that prices may be reduced so low as to work injury to Australian industries by unfair competition, and a combination to restore to a fair level prices that had been reduced to a dangerous limit could not for that reason be regarded as contravening the law.

The court said, at page 653:

If by superiority of service or commodity, by lower prices, more desirable terms, or any of the arts and inducements known to active rivalry, always consistent with healthy competition, and free from force or fraud, a trader attracts to himself the whole of the trade in any particular direction, he does not offend against the law of monopoly. The field of opportunity is open to all; he has fairly used it and has succeeded. He has succeeded not because he has silenced but because he has outstripped his competitors, and because the public find it to their advantage to voluntarily accept his service in preference to that of others they might have; and should he abuse his opportunity by asking unduly high prices, or restricting facilities or otherwise, the field is as open as ever for competitors to offer and for the public to accept. At all events, up to that point, he has neither done nor intended any harm to the community. But if not content with serving the public to the best of his ability and letting consequences take care of themselves, he so acts as to purposely concentrate in himself the existing means of public satisfaction in such a way and to such an extent as in the circumstances to prevent or destroy all reasonably effective competition, he does, within the meaning of the statute, monopolize or attempt to monopolize. Competition itself connotes attraction of trade, and so long as it remains legitimate the law, as I read it, does not reprove it simply because it attains its necessary object.

When, however, a trader forsakes his quality of competitor and becomes an engrosser, when he sets himself to stifle or strike down effective competition which stands as a commercial protection between himself and the community at large, and so substantially to gather into his own hands the power of dictating the terms upon which the public needs may be satisfied he offends against the enactment.

So I may say that under this bill he would clearly offend against this enactment; and no court would have any difficulty—especially the Supreme Court of the United States, with all its experience—in knowing what "unfair competition" meant.

Judge Isaacs goes on:

In my opinion the prevention or destruction of all reasonable and effective competition—the natural commercial safeguard of the public—is at the root of the conception of monopoly within the meaning of the statute.

In order to get very complete and specific information about unfair competition one has only to turn to the decrees in cases under the Sherman Act. There will be found precisely defined numerous examples of unfair competition. Nowhere is it more indispensable to use language having precise meaning than in a decree. Yet in the case of United States against General Electric Co., in the decree entered by the Circuit Court for the Northern District of Ohio, Eastern Division, at the end of the eighth clause enjoining the use of a specific unfair method of competition, the following language is found:

Provided further, That nothing in this decree shall be taken in any respect to enjoin or restrain fair, free, and open competition.

In addition, there are numerous textbooks on unfair competition in which the authorities are collected and analyzed. Among such works are Singer on Trade-Mark Laws of the World, and Unfair Trade; Paul on the Law of Trade-Marks, Including Trade Names and Unfair Competition; Nims on The Law of Unfair Business Competition; Hopkins on The Law of Trade-Marks, Trade Names, and Unfair Competition; Hesseltine's Digest of the Law of Trade-Marks and Unfair Trade.

(c) The objection that orders of the commission are not subject to review by the courts is easily met. The language of the section in its present form would seem to provide for review by the courts. But if it is thought not to do so, it can easily be changed; and since a different construction has been put upon it, it should be amended so as to prevent the possibility of such mistake.

(d) The objection that the commission will be overloaded by the task imposed upon it is not well taken. The commission alone can initiate a proceeding. It is not bound to act on complaint. It will only act when it deems action desirable in the public interest, and it will not undertake more than it can do.

(e) In the course of his recent and able speech the Senator from Idaho said:

I fear the time may come, if this law is enacted, when it will be used as a buffer in prosecutions under the Sherman law, when defendants, in cases brought under that law, will seek shelter behind the decision of this trade commission as to what constitutes unfair competition. The law now contemplates forcing competition, and this law would prohibit unfair competition. I doubt the wisdom of putting business in this strait-jacket.

I call the attention of the Senator from Idaho to this part of my remarks.

The Senator does not seem to have noted the inconsistency between his fear that defendants in prosecutions under the Sherman law will seek shelter behind the decisions of the trade commission and his doubt of the wisdom of putting business in this strait-jacket. If the Sherman law will be weakened by conferring upon the trade commission the power to prevent unfair competition, how can it be said that the effect will be to put business in a strait-jacket? His fear and his doubt, however, are equally unfounded. The commission will have no power to authorize the use of a method of competition as fair or to give immunity from the Sherman law. The only orders the commission can issue are orders prohibiting the use of unfair methods of competition. It is not possible to weaken the Sherman law in that way. The idea that business will be put in a strait-jacket implies an equally singular misconception. Unfair competition is the most effective weapon of monopoly. Prevention of unfair competition, instead of putting business in a strait-jacket, will liberate business. Fair, free, and open competition is the object which the Sherman Act, no less than this bill, seeks to promote. The two laws will be in perfect harmony.

I now desire to yield to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], who evidenced a desire to ask a question when I started.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I shall reply to the Senator in my own time and in my own way.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, has the Senator concluded?

Mr. HOLLIS. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator yield to me to have a telegram read?

Mr. BORAH. I will.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask that the telegram I send to the desk, from J. R. Moorehead, secretary of the National Federation of Retail Merchants, Kansas City, Mo., may be read by the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH in the chair). Without objection, that will be done.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Western Union night letter.]

KANSAS CITY, MO., July 14, 1914.

Senator FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS,
Washington, D. C.:

Hope you stand firm for unfair competition clause in trade commission bill. It is the only hope of the small business man as against his larger competitors and certainly gives no guilty person or corporation a chance to escape final punishment for violating the antitrust law. It would require more money than the average small business man is worth to hire attorneys and pay costs to protect himself against unfair competition. Unless the Government undertakes to protect him through such a trade commission as you suggest he is powerless to protect himself. Commission should have power to investigate and correct abuses before expensive litigation, which we are unable to bear, is forced upon us by one-sided investigations and indictments. Sherman law was intended to protect the small business man as well as the public. As it now operates big business can use it without violating it to intimidate and destroy small competitors, who are prohibited from combining for self-protection by the same law.

J. R. MOOREHEAD,
Secretary National Federation of Retail Merchants.

Mr. REED rose.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire having addressed his remarks in the opening of his speech to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and at the close of his speech to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], the Chair recognizes first the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. NELSON. Mr President, will the Senator from Missouri yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. REED. I will.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to say that I have received telegrams similar to that just read from retail merchants in Minnesota. They labor under the impression that section 5 of the trade commission bill covers all cases of unfair competition between all classes of business. When I call the attention of the man sending the telegram to the fact that the bill is limited to corporations and does not affect partnerships or individuals he is totally astonished, and I apprehend that will be the case with the author of this telegram from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, until within the last hour I had no idea the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] was an enemy of mine.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will permit me to disclaim any such idea as that I am his enemy. I tried to answer a very forceful and direct speech in a forceful and direct way.

Mr. REED. I shall be more generous to the Senator than he was to me. I shall permit him to interrupt me. But when he was speaking and making his deliberately prepared assault, which he read from a document, he refused to allow me the privilege of correcting any misstatement he made in order that it might appear in the RECORD in connection with his statement.

Generally a refusal to be interrupted has its basis in the fact that the gentleman who has the floor is either doubtful of his logic or fearful of his facts. I was not permitted, as the Senator went along, to correct the numerous inaccuracies and partial statements of his address. He seemed to be inspired by a species of acrimony growing out of the fact that I have dared to criticize one section of this bill. He ascribes to me by innuendo, if not by direct statement, a desire to defeat all remedial legislation. He assumes with a modesty which characterizes all his acts that anyone opposed in the slightest degree to a production of his pen or brain must be at enmity with all reforms and all virtuous movements.

It frequently happens in this country that there are men so constituted they can not understand how one may oppose them and still desire to occupy a position of decent citizenship. I apprehend that in the whole course of my life this is the first time that anyone hiding behind a veiled insinuation has sought to hold me up to the country as a champion of monopoly or as opposed to remedial legislation. I am not embarrassed by an insinuation of that kind under these circumstances and conditions. Deliberate misquotation of what has been said, partial quotation of what has been said, distortion of the facts in cases solemnly reported and read into the RECORD have never obscured the truth and will deceive none but the unwary.

I came into this Chamber one day, as the Senator well knows, and found the trade commission bill being discussed as though section 5 were to cover every sort of rascally practice indulged in by men in commerce. With that thought before me I stated that the term had no definite meaning. I made my statement with that thought before me so broad that it could be well said I had made a general statement. But I was discussing the phrase in the light of the discussion then going on and not the question as to whether the phrase had a totally different meaning in the law. Subsequently, and among the very first few words of my second speech, in which I discussed the real meaning of the phrase, I made that plain, so plain that no one but a very careless man or a very vindictive enemy ought to have mistaken it, for I said:

> In addressing myself to this subject a few days ago I asserted rather broadly that the term "unfair competition in commerce" had no definite or fixed meaning in law. I find that the statement which I made is broader than I intended to make it. I meant to say, and I now say, that "unfair competition" has no such meaning in the law as will embrace the objects and purposes of the author of this bill.

Certainly common fairness ought to have led the Senator to have given my second statement due prominence.

I intend to reply to the address of the Senator, but I do not intend to reply to it to-day, because I want to lay before the Senate an analysis of the decisions which he has cited and of the statutes he has quoted. I shall undertake to show that every decision he has cited which is not bottomed upon some special statute of a State is merely a decision arising under the antitrust acts; that the question being tried was whether the antitrust acts had been violated; that the term "unfair competition" was employed merely in colloquial sense. I shall try to show, as I said the other day, that there is no well-considered case, especially of any Federal court, holding that the term "unfair competition" has any other or different meaning than the limited one defined in the dictionary and in the cases which I read.

Now, the Senator has cited a number of statutes of States which I have not read and which for the most part he did not read, but I caught from the title of the acts that these special laws did embrace a specification or definition of what constituted unfair competition.

Nobody has doubted and nobody could doubt that in writing a statute we might employ any term, however distinct its meaning is in the law, and we could by apt and proper words give to it in the statute an entirely different meaning than it has at the common law.

All that I have stated on this branch of the case is that if you employ the term "unfair competition" without any definition, without any specification, the courts will ascribe to it the meaning which the courts already hold it to have, namely, a term which merely covers those practices whereby A substitutes his goods on the market for the goods of B. I stated that if the friends of this bill were to effectuate their purpose they must do it by either adopting some other general term which covers the character of practices against which they inveigh or by using descriptive phrases prohibiting certain acts, or, at least, the character of the acts.

The Senator in his generosity said that I had declined to prepare such phraseology. I hardly know how to reply to that assertion and use parliamentary language. I never declined any such office. I finished my remarks here the other day and was compelled immediately to attend the Judiciary Committee or the Committee on Banking and Currency. I have been engaged in work on these committees constantly, and I have had no opportunity to undertake to perfect this phraseology. I made no such declination or refusal.

With the Senator's suspicions that I may be against the entire bill I have no concern. Neither his suspicions nor his opinions disturb me or will disturb me.

Mr. President, I did take two positions, and I take them now. First, I say if we adopt section 5 without amendment its scope will be limited to the prevention of what has been determined to be unfair competition by the courts; namely, those acts which consist in the substitution of one man's goods for the goods of another in the market.

I have taken the other position that if the view just stated be not correct then the term is a general term so vague, so indefinite, and so uncertain that the courts are likely to hold that it has substituted or sought to substitute the opinion of three men as to what can and can not be done for the Constitution of the United States and the law of the land.

It is easy enough to understand how we can create a commission and give it the power merely to investigate, and we can undoubtedly create a commission and give it the power to go beyond mere investigation. We can probably give it the power over certain subjects to enforce a law or rule which we write. But we can not give it the power to create a law and to make a rule out of its own brain, and substitute the arbitrary rule of three men for the law of the land.

That is the position I have taken. So I say if we accept section 5 at all we must define properly the authority of this board and lay down a rule which will enable the business men of this country to determine from the law and not from the will of three men what they may do and what they may not do.

It is quite a consistent thing to argue in this wise and still to be in favor of enforcing and strengthening the trust laws. No man will go further than I will to throttle monopoly in its inception. If I may use a very awkward expression, I am in favor of promoting monopolistic infanticide. I would like to see the practices which lead to monopoly prohibited by the lawmaking power; but I would at the same time give to the citizens of this country a law which would tell them what was prohibited and not remit them to the opinions of three gentlemen—for three will constitute a majority of the board.

I would do that for two reasons: First, because the citizen is entitled to that protection under the Constitution of this country, and, second, I would do it because I am unwilling to put all the business of the United States in a condition where a change of one member in a board might determine the question whether a business transaction was lawful or unlawful.

The statement has been made here repeatedly that the same arguments I am now advancing were made when we created the Interstate Commerce Commission. Mr. President, I presume the same argument I am making has been made not only by those who opposed the Interstate Commerce Commission, but it has been made in defense of human right a thousand times, aye, ten thousand times, when it was properly and rightfully made. The demagogic appeal to prejudice, that an argument was made at some time that was not applicable in that particular case, and the invocation in the sacred name of the Interstate Commerce Commission smack of the same kind of so-called argument which has too frequently characterized this debate. Some gentlemen seem to think that what we want to do here is to pass a law willy nilly, Constitution or no Constitution, right or no right, to drive straight on.

The remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire indicated that it was quite a proper thing for Congress to pass an unconstitutional law and then let the courts declare it to be unconstitutional, and that no harm is done. Yet this is the very fountain source of the law. Every man who has advanced to that desk to take the oath of office swore before his God to uphold the Constitution of the United States. It is in our keeping, it is in our care in a peculiarly sacred manner, and when it is proposed that the Congress of the United States shall begin trampling upon the Constitution of the United States, I ask, What criticism can justly be made of the anarchist, who says in his vulgar phraseology, which I can not repeat, that the Constitution is to be disregarded?

It is the business of Congress to go on and pass laws and to say to the courts, "Correct us," or is it our business to use every possible care to see that laws enacted here are just laws, are wise laws, are laws that we have the right under our oath of office to pass, laws that are sanctioned by the Constitution?

There are men who would prefer a commission to a constitution. I have no doubt there were men in the days of George III who preferred the government of the king to the government of the Constitution. There were men in the days when our fathers founded this Government who preferred a concentration of vast power in the hands of a few men. There were even some men who would have preferred, I doubt not, giving arbitrary power to a centralized government. But, sir, wiser counsels prevailed, and from the lips of Jefferson and Madison and Adams and Washington, and all the immortals who founded this Government, came the declaration that this should be a government of law and not a government of men, a government of law that the people had enacted, not a government by decree of a king or by the mandate of any board or potentate. It was held then to be of the very essentials of liberty that every citizen of this country, every man then living and every man who should thereafter come upon the soil over which our flag floated, should have laid down before him rules of law which he could follow. It was pointed out then, and it may well be repeated to-day, that that is alone the difference between freedom and slavery, between a republic and an oligarchy, between liberty and monarchy.

So when it is sneeringly proposed that we shall disregard the Constitution and let the courts correct us afterwards, I say it would have been better if such a doctrine as that had been uttered in a meeting of anarchists assembled in the crowded districts of a great city than upon the floor of the United States Senate.

Mr. President, I have been an advocate of the doctrine that the Supreme Court of the United States should not have authority to set aside an act of Congress except by the concurrence of two-thirds of its members. I have advocated that because I believed in my inexperience that Congress, being largely composed of lawyers and charged with the great responsibilities imposed upon it, was not passing laws improvidently, but was carefully keeping within the limits of the Constitution. But if we are to have the doctrine announced, "Pass the law anyway and let the courts take care of it," then, thank God, we have courts to take care of it.

Down in Kentucky they passed a law, and I suppose somebody there stood up and sneered at those who dared mention the fact that there was a constitution. This law was passed in 1906. I read from the acts of Kentucky for the year 1906, at page 429, chapter 117:

1. It is hereby declared lawful for any number of persons to combine, unite, or pool any or all of the crops of wheat, tobacco, corn, oats, hay, or other farm products raised by them for the purpose of classifying, grading, storing, holding, selling, or disposing of same, either in parcels or as a whole, in order or for the purpose of obtaining a greater or higher price therefor than they might or could obtain or receive by selling said crops separately or individually.

2. That contracts or agreements made or entered into by persons with each other the object or intent of which is to unite, pool, or combine all or any of the crops of tobacco, wheat, corn, oats, hay, or other farm products raised by such persons for the purpose of classifying, grading, storing, holding, selling, or disposing of said crops, or any of them, either in parts or as a whole, in order or for the purpose of obtaining a better or higher price therefor than could or might be obtained by selling said crops separately or individually, are hereby permitted, and shall not because of any such combination or purpose of said persons be declared illegal or invalid.

Section 3 of the act was thereafter amended so that it read:

Such persons so entering into such an agreement or contract as is set out in the foregoing sections are hereby permitted to select an agent or agents through or by or with whom said parties so entering into such agreement may classify, grade, store, hold, sell, or dispose of said crop, or any of them, and said agent or agents shall have the right to take, receive, hold, store, classify, grade, sell, or dispose of said crop so placed in said agreement, for the purpose of accomplishing the object of such combination or agreement between such principals, and contracts and agreements entered into by such agent or agents for the purpose of classifying, grading, storing, holding, selling, or disposing of said crop so combined, united, or pooled, either in parcel or as a whole, are hereby permitted, and shall not because of any such combination or purpose of such original agreement of such principals so entering into said combination, or of such agent or agents, be declared illegal or invalid.

All contracts heretofore made by any person or persons for the purposes set out in the foregoing sections are hereby declared valid, if otherwise legally binding on the parties. To prevent any breach or violation of any contract made for the purposes set out in the foregoing sections a restraining order and writ of injunction may be issued by proper officer, as prescribed in the Civil Code of Practice.

For any breach or violation of any contract entered into for the purposes set out in the foregoing sections, the injured party may recover the damages sustained by him by reason of such violation of such contract of the person violating the same, and also of any person who shall induce or persuade another to violate such contract, which damages shall include the reasonable expense and attorneys' fees incurred by the injured party in prosecuting an action to recover such damages, or to prevent a violation of such contract, if the party complaining shall succeed in doing so, which may be recovered in the same action or original proceeding. Said agent, when so selected as herein provided, shall have the sole right to sell said crop so pooled or combined, and it shall be unlawful for any owner of such crop to sell or dispose of same, and for any person to knowingly purchase the same, without the written consent of such agent, and upon conviction thereof he or they shall be fined in any sum or amount not exceeding $250 for each offense, to be fixed by the jury in their discretion.

2. Whereas many crops of tobacco and other products have been combined and pooled in this State under contract and agreement entered into for the purposes set out in the above section, an emergency is now declared to exist, which requires that this act should and it shall take effect from and after its passage and approval by the governor.

Mr. President, that was thought to be a great piece of legislation in its day and generation, and its day and generation are about now; but the Supreme Court of the United States had to be called upon to construe it, and they did construe it in the case of Patrick Collins, plaintiff in error, against the Commonwealth of Kentucky, which was decided on June 22, 1914. When the court got through with it there was not anything left of the statute.

Did Kentucky gain anything by putting upon its statute books a law that could not be enforced? Did it not lose all the months and years intervening after the passage of a law which fell dead from the pen that engrossed it? Was it not an absolute injury to the purposes and objects of those who sought to permit certain practices? Would it not have been wiser, then, to have written a law that could stand the assaults to be made upon it in the courts? I have read this statute and cited this decision merely for the purpose of emphasizing to the friends of this bill the importance of preparing a bill that will stand, and of not putting forward one that is doubtful, to say the best, and in all probability a law which can not be sustained. Every day we spend in passing a law which can not be enforced, every day that we spend in trying to enforce a law that can not stand, is that much time lost in the great cause that we all seek to serve.

I am no enemy of proper trust legislation. The Senator who made these unkind remarks knows that I am laboring with the Judiciary Committee to try to perfect a trust statute that will give at least some guide to the business of this country, and yet will arrest in their inception the very practices which have been referred to as so injurious. Before any Senator rises and attributes to a brother Senator such motives, he ought to have some reason for doing it other than those born of personal dislike.

Mr. President, I rose to speak for only a moment, and have taken too much time. I apologize to the Senate for taking it now, because I intend hereafter to reply at length to the speech of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] will yield to me under the circumstances for a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has seen fit to serve notice on the Senate that any man who dares to point out the inconsistencies of his arguments, to show that the authorities on which he bases his arguments have been overruled, or to show any hole in his logic, must be considered his enemy. I am very sorry that the Senator has given that notice to the Senate, because no one likes to be considered the enemy of anyone in the Senate, and particularly the enemy of such a brilliant and resourceful Senator as the one who has just spoken; but, Mr. President, the pity of the remark is that it may prevent some timid Senator from making a speech at some time to the Senate, and the country may thereby lose something of real value; but I assure the Senator that his remarks, so far as they apply to me, will not tend in the slightest to close my mouth. I shall always be sorry when a man is so sensitive and thin-skinned as to believe that pointing out the inconsistencies of an argument are the assaults of an enemy; but if that is so I can not help it.

I am very sorry for it, and I am more sorry for the man who feels that way than I am for myself; but a Senator who is so vigorous in his swordplay as is the junior Senator from Missouri has no right to be so sensitive when the very weapons he employs against others are for the moment turned against him.

My only thought was that the Senator was attacking a bill in which I am interested. I am not the author of the bill, but I believe firmly in it. The Senator says he is opposed to it because he is opposed to commissions. I think I quote him correctly.

There has been no charge, so far as I am concerned, that the Senator has been opposed to trust legislation, but I do charge that he is against this particular piece of trust legislation. My arguments were directed against him because I understood him in that way, and I so understand him now. I prepared my remarks and put them in writing purposely, so that I might know what I was saying. There is no mistake in them; there is no misquotation; there is no assault in them; and anyone who has tried as many cases as my friend has against distinguished lawyers ought by this time to have learned to give and take in fair argument. As my remarks were prepared, so they will appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to-morrow; and I challenge any Senator to point out any misquotation of any kind or any insinuation in them. Every charge was directly made, as I believe charges should be directly made. What the Senator from Missouri said on three different days is also in the RECORD; and in my quotations from his speech, I have given the pages where he said the things he has said.

The Senator will find, if he turns to his speech made on Monday last, that the distinguished Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] asked him to suggest proper words that would carry out the intent of this proposed statute; the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] appealed to the Senator from Missouri to help perfect this statute; he has been asked to do it, and he has declined to do it. The RECORD shows, as I understand him—I fear to quote him, because I may not quote him exactly right—that the substance of his promise now is that when he has time he will help us. I so understand it; and I sincerely hope he will, for we could not have better help, and help is what we want in framing this bill.

I have not advocated the passing of an unconstitutional statute. I say this proposed statute is constitutional, and I say it will effect what we want. It is therefore no more than natural that a Senator who is opposed to a commission of this kind should fight this proposed law if he thinks it will be effective and do the things which he thinks ought not to be done through a commission.

With these remarks I leave it.

[Mr. BORAH addressed the Senate. See Appendix.]

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. In furtherance of what the Senator from Idaho has said, to the effect that Mr. Jones has no desire to conceal his views on the trust question, I will read the following telegram, which I have within the hour received from him:

[Telegram.]

CHICAGO, ILL., July 15, 1914.

Hon. G. M. HITCHCOCK, Washington, D. C.:

I see from the newspapers that controversy has arisen over the publication of my testimony before Banking and Currency Committee. I do not assume the right to have anything to say in the matter, but perhaps I may be permitted to say that I have not the slightest objection to such publication, but would, on the contrary, rather welcome it.

THOMAS D. JONES.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think if we have one more session behind closed doors, so that the rest of the hearings can be read, the public will be in full possession of all the facts. [Laughter.]

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, I am reading this for the purpose of illustrating the practical proposition which is now being presented to the Senate, and I do not care whether it is the testimony given by Mr. Jones before the committee or his public view of the questions, it is an illustration of what may happen under this proposition to transfer the lawmaking power—because that is what it will result in—and the capacity or the ability or authority to determine what is "unfair competition" to five men who may have a wholly different view from what the Senator from New Hampshire has as to what is "unfair competition." Mr. Jones was being interrogated by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]:

Senator POMERENE. As a general proposition, do you approve of the combination of these large manufacturing concerns that are in the same line of business, so as to control the trade of a country so large as this country? You can answer that question or not, just as you wish.

Mr. JONES. Why, that opens up a very interesting question——

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PITTMAN in the chair). The Senator from Maryland will state his point of order.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. The Vice President decided this morning that proceedings in a committee which was charged to investigate a matter pending in executive session were proceedings within executive session. Now, the Senator from Idaho is reading from the proceedings within an executive session of the Senate here in open session, and in obvious violation of its rules. Under these circumstances I raise the point of order as to whether the Senator from Idaho has a right openly to violate the rules of the Senate as the Vice President this morning construed them.

Further, Mr. President, I am perfectly willing, before I sit down, to make the statement that, individually, I am in favor of changing the rules in a lawful and orderly manner, so that all nominations which bear a political aspect may be discussed in the open; but I believe that the American people will have more respect for the Senate if we proceed in an orderly manner to change our rules in a lawful way, rather than to give to those Members of the Senate who are willing to proceed in an unlawful manner, contrary to the rules of the Senate, an advantage over the law-abiding Members of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho is reading what purports to be from a newspaper, and is commenting on it. The point of order made by the Senator from Maryland does not appear to the Chair to be within the precedents of the Senate, and the point of order is overruled.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr BORAH. I do.

Mr. GRONNA. May I ask the Senator from Maryland, with the permission of the Senator from Idaho, the particular matter he refers to that happened this morning?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I understand the Senator from Idaho is quoting something from the Post which purports to be——

Mr. GRONNA. I understand that; but what I should like to know is, What decision does the Senator from Maryland refer to?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I refer to a decision by the President of the Senate, which he rendered this morning, to the effect that the proceedings in a committee of the Senate upon an executive nomination are within the rules governing the privacy of executive sessions.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I did not feel that I was violating the rules of the Senate by reading a matter which appeared in the public prints. If I had felt so, I should have waited until the vote was taken in executive session, which will result in having it made public. I did not, however, feel that I was violating the rule, and I prefer not to rest under the charge of being a lawless individual.

I never have divulged anything that came to me from the executive sessions of the Senate. I have sometimes, when absent, found very accurate information in the newspapers when I got back. I do not know how it got out.

I simply want to say that I do not propose, out of a mere superficial and insincere appearance of obeying the rules, to be curtailed in legitimate debate here upon matters which are in the public possession. All these matters are in the possession of the public. Here is a thing which appeared in the papers this morning. I am only discussing that which is already in the possession of the public. The people of the United States will not have very much respect for us if we refuse to discuss the matters which are in the public possession out of a mere superficial and flimsy regard for rules which really do not cover the subject we are discussing.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator two questions. The first is, Did not he lend the weight of his good reputation and high responsibility to the credibility of this alleged newspaper report of the secret proceedings of the Senate when he said, in open Senate, that he believed the report to be true?

Mr. BORAH. I did. I enter that plea. I rather think the statements are true.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Yes. Did not the Senator confirm the revelation, if a revelation has been made?

Mr. BORAH. I think it is a little too dignified to call the manner in which this got out a "revelation." [Laughter.]

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Secondly, would not the Senate stand better before the country if it proceeded to amend its rules in the regular, law-abiding fashion, rather than to proceed by a constant disregard of its rules, apparently approved by the leading Members of the body?

Mr. BORAH. The Senator will agree with me that I have done all I could to mend the situation, because for some time I have advocated open sessions upon these matters. Now, if I really believed this was in violation of the rule I should defer my remarks until another date; but it never occurred to me that a discussion of a newspaper article could be in any way considered as a violation of the rules simply because it purports to give a reference to executive business.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. If the Senator will pardon another interruption, I have been myself very much tempted to discuss a newspaper publication in connection with the nomination of Mr. Jones—a publication given out by the chairman of the committee, and which publication, though remarkably fair from an opponent of the confirmation, was nevertheless lacking in a good deal that might have been fairly said therein. I was much tempted to correct or enlarge the statement made, so that the proper public impression might have been made upon the subject; but we gentlemen on the committee who look with some reverence upon the rules of the Senate until they are lawfully changed have found that our hands are tied upon the subject, and that the public impression, which doubtless reacts upon the Senate in some measure, has gone out the other way.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wanted to find out whether I correctly understood the statement of the Senator from Maryland. Did he say he reverenced the rules of the Senate?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Well, I would not use that expression, and I hope I did not.

Mr. THOMAS. I hope so, too. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEE of Maryland. But I respect them, and I have promised to uphold them, though there are many of them, like this secret-session business, which I should like to see abolished.

Mr. BORAH. I shall take some interest in the vote of the Senator when the question comes to open session.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Idaho, if he expects to continue his observations at any considerable length, whether it would be agreeable to him to take up the thread of his discourse to-morrow morning and let us have an executive session?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, of course I can do as I always do, and yield to the convenience of the chairman of the committee. I will finish these remarks at some other time and undertake then to apply the views of the gentleman who has been selected for the Federal Reserve Board to the practical application of a Federal trade commission.

Mr. STONE. I have no wish, of course, to interfere with the Senator's remarks except in a way that is entirely agreeable to him. It is now getting somewhat late if we are to have an executive session.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I will yield. I will simply say, before I yield, that I was drawn into this debate by the reference made by the Senator from New Hampshire, and I always prefer to reply to such matters while they are fresh in my mind. I will yield, however.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 300) to continue the provisions of a joint resolution approved June 30, 1914, entitled "Joint resolution extending appropriations for the necessary operations of the Government and of the District of Columbia under certain contingencies," and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. STONE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 50 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

NOMINATION OF THOMAS D. JONES (S. DOC. NO. 545).

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move that the injunction of secrecy be removed from the hearing had before the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency on the nomination of Thomas D. Jones for appointment as a member of the Federal Reserve Board, and that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. REED. I ask that the hearing be printed as a document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PITTMAN in the chair). Without objection, that action will be taken, and the hearing will be ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

NOMINATION OF THOMAS D. JONES FOR APPOINTMENT AS A MEMBER OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD.

MONDAY, JULY 6, 1914.

COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY,
UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C.

The committee assembled at 10.30 o'clock a. m.

Present: Senators GILBERT M. HITCHCOCK (presiding), REED, POMERENE, SHAFROTH, HOLLIS, LEE, NELSON, BRISTOW, CRAWFORD, and MCLEAN.

Senator HITCHCOCK. The committee has invited Mr. Thomas D. Jones, of Chicago, to appear for the purpose of giving the committee any further information he may desire. Mr. Jones, will you please state, for the record, your name, residence, and business?

STATEMENT OF MR. THOMAS D. JONES, OF CHICAGO, ILL.

Mr. JONES. My name is Thomas D. Jones. My residence is Chicago. Do you want the street address?

Senator HITCHCOCK. I hardly think that will be necessary.

Mr. JONES. At present I am not in active business. I was an attorney at law for some years.

Senator HITCHCOCK. Mr. Jones, the committee is charged with the duty of making a report to the Senate on your nomination to be a member of the Federal Reserve Board, and finds certain business connections of yours that it would like to have further information about; and I think the first question that may be properly taken up is your connection with the International Harvester Co. as a director. Will you please state when you became a director of that company?

Mr. JONES. I became a director of the International Harvester Co. in November, 1909.

Senator HITCHCOCK. Had you, previous to that time, been interested in the company?

Mr. JONES. I had no interest of any kind in that company previous to that time. I had no connection whatever with it of any sort.

Senator HITCHCOCK. Had you any connection of any sort with its subsidiary companies?

Mr. JONES. I had no connection of any sort with its subsidiary companies.

Senator HITCHCOCK. You are not one of the Jones family mentioned in the Piano Co.?

Mr. JONES. I am not. Mr. Jones of the Piano Co. I had never met until I became a member of the board, although I knew of him.

Senator HITCHCOCK. You are named as one of the defendants in the action brought by the United States?

Mr. JONES. I am.

Senator HITCHCOCK. Against the harvester company?

Mr. JONES. I am.

Senator HITCHCOCK. When was that action brought?

Mr. JONES. That action was brought in the summer of the presidential campaign—that would be the summer of 1912, would it not?

Senator SHAFROTH. Yes.

Mr. JONES. The summer of 1912.

Senator HITCHCOCK. Did you yourself answer in that case?

Mr. JONES. A joint answer was put in on behalf of all the defendants.

Senator HITCHCOCK. What was the nature of the answer on your part?

Mr. JONES. The nature of the answer on my part was a denial of any conspiracy in restraint of trade. The answer was put in by the attorneys of the company, and consisted in the main of a general denial of the charges of the bill.

Senator HITCHCOCK. Your answer was identical with the others?

Mr. JONES. My answer was identical with that of the other individual defendants.

Senator HITCHCOCK. Have you appeared as a witness in the hearing in that case?

Mr. JONES. I have not.

Senator POMERENE. May I ask a question here, Mr. Chairman?

Senator HITCHCOCK. Certainly.

Senator POMERENE. Were there separate answers filed for each of the defendants, or was there a joint answer of all?

Mr. JONES. Certain groups of the defendants answered together, is my recollection. The answers were put in by the attorneys of the company, and there were certain charges—the corporation made certain answers—and then my recollection is that certain charges were made specifically against certain of the defendants which were answered. But those directors who had nothing to do with the organization, their answers were general.

Senator HITCHCOCK. What do you mean by "general," Mr. Jones?

Mr. JONES. Denying the intention to monopolize or to accomplish a restraint of trade, and denying the practices that were alleged to be oppressive.

Senator HITCHCOCK. A part of the complaint as it was read to the committee was with regard to continuing acts of the corporation down to very recent years; down to the filing of the suit in 1912. Have you any acquaintance with those acts complained of?

Mr. JONES. No, sir; and my reading of the record was that, although there is such a general allegation, there is absolutely no proof of it. The charges were made as of continuing acts; but I read the briefs of counsel of the various sides, and the case finally turned almost entirely on the method of the original organization of the company as being an attempt to create a monopoly in restraint of trade.

Senator HITCHCOCK. Would you like to state to the committee your reasons for your going into the directorate of this company without having any financial interest in it?

Mr. JONES. Certainly. I had been on terms of close intimacy with the McCormick family since I went to Chicago, over 30 years ago, and in the early part of 1909 they said to me that there was a vacancy on the board of the Harvester Co. and they would like me to consent to become a director. I told them what they knew already, that I had no interest whatever in the stock of the concern, and had no plans contemplating an investment; and they said they knew that, and that it was not an investor in stocks that they were looking for, it was somebody who could afford to give the time and was willing to give the time—such time as would be demanded as a director of the company—and they asked me as a personal favor to consent to do so.

Senator HITCHCOCK. Not for any compensation?

Mr. JONES. Not the slightest nor the promise of any or the expectation of any.

Senator POMERENE. When you say "they," will you please state the names?

Mr. JONES. Mr. Cyrus H. McCormick was the man who asked me; but he told me that he was speaking on behalf of his mother and brother and sister and the family. My acquaintance had been a family acquaintance from the time I went to Chicago.

Senator HITCHCOCK. It was then a matter of personal feeling for the McCormick family that led you to become a director; acting on a desire to gratify them?

Mr. JONES. The request was made to me as a personal favor, a personal matter, and that was the initial motive in my giving consent. The work was to me an interesting one. I had the time to give it; and the relations of corporations to their employees and to the public is an interesting question; and I was willing to give the time, and I had the time to give; and I met the request of my friends for those reasons; and at the same time I recognized that it was a work that was worth giving some time and attention to; and I did give such time and attention as the work seemed to require.

Senator HITCHCOCK. Will you state the nature of the duties of the directors?

Mr. JONES. The duties of the directors of the International Harvester Co. are not particularly different from the duties of directors of other companies. Questions of general policy came regularly before the board.

Senator HITCHCOCK. In what form?

Mr. JONES. The relations of the company to its employees has had a good deal of attention by the board of the International Harvester Co., in the way of profit sharing and schemes of that sort, which are occupying the attention of the directors of a great many corporations at the present time; which are not yet satisfactorily solved, but they will be later.

Senator CRAWFORD. Just how long had the International Harvester Co. been in existence when you went on the board?

Mr. JONES. The International Harvester Co. was organized in 1901.

Senator NELSON. 1902, my impression is; but you may be right.

Mr. JONES. Either 1901 or 1902.

Senator REED. Mr. Chairman, I hope the Senator will not misunderstand me; but I suggest, for the sake of order that we let the chairman finish his questions, and then let the Senator ask questions; that is in order that we may not get at cross purposes.

Senator CRAWFORD. I very seldom ask any questions; and I am usually corrected in that way by the Senator when I do. [Laughter.]

Senator REED. I never corrected you in my life; and I would be more likely to offend than you; but I make that suggestion because I can see that otherwise we might be acting at cross purposes. I am willing to be governed by it myself, although sometimes I am tempted to break that rule.

Senator HITCHCOCK. The acting chairman only desired to ask sufficient questions to bring the matter before the committee and then intended to leave it to the members to take up; and I think I have about accomplished that purpose; and other members of the committee are better posted on this end of the subject than I am.

There is another matter concerning a business connection of Mr. Jones that I think had better be taken up afterwards, if it meets the approval of the committee; and the chairman will now ask the other members of the committee to ask questions as to the International Harvester Co. I would suggest that Senator Reed begin.

Senator REED. Mr. Jones, you had no connection whatever with the International Harvester Co. until you became a director, as I understand it?

Mr. JONES. None whatever.

Senator REED. Did you have any business relations with any of the principal owners of the stock?

Mr. JONES. None whatever. I never had any professional or business relations with any of the members of the McCormick family; it was purely a personal acquaintance.

Senator REED. How did you acquire the one share of stock which you have?

Mr. JONES. The company carries a certain amount of stock which it issues to its stockholders, by way of bonus; it has invested in its name a portion of the shares of stock; and I purchased the stock from the company and paid par for it.

Senator REED. That would be $100, I suppose?

Mr. JONES. One hundred dollars.

Senator REED. What was the capital stock of the company?

Mr. JONES. At that time it was $120,000,000; $60,000,000 of preferred and $60,000,000 of common stock.

Senator REED. How much of that stock was in the hands of the voting trust?

Mr. JONES. I could not tell you that. That was a matter that the corporation, as such, had nothing to do with. The voting trust was created without the intervention of the corporation itself. But there was a large part. There was more than a majority of the stock.

Senator REED. Practically all of it?

Mr. JONES. Well, I should say a very large part of it. I really do not know just what it was. But the corporation, as a corporation, of course, had nothing to do with the voting trust.

Senator REED. I understand; but is not this true—so that we can get at it in a word—that when the International Harvester Co. was organized all of the stock, except one share to each of the directors, was impounded primarily from the stockholders into the hands of a voting trust, and did not those trustees hold the shares of stock, issuing to the various parties who had put up assets or money, not certificates of stock, but certificates of the voting trust reciting that they held for the use and benefit of those owners certain shares of stock? That was the preliminary and original organization, was it not?

Mr. JONES. That is, I understand, substantially correct, except that I would not say that I think substantially all. I do not know what amount. I know there was more than a majority of the stock.

Senator REED. Complete control of the corporation for a number of years was by this device placed in the hands of the voting trustees?

Mr. JONES. Control of the stock?

Senator REED. Yes.

Mr. JONES. Yes; that is correct.

Senator REED. And a contract was made with the various parties who came into this organization, the various companies and the owners of the various companies—that is, the owners of the stock—by which their interest was to be paid for in the stock of the International Harvester Co., and, instead of the stock being turned over to them, at least a majority of it was held by the voting trustees?

Mr. JONES. That is correct.

Senator REED. Now, that arrangement was to continue for how many years?

Mr. JONES. That arrangement was to continue for five years; and there was a provision in the trust agreement that it might be extended for another five years, at the will of the trustees, and it was so extended.

Senator REED. Yes. That agreemant was made about 1902?

Mr. JONES. Either 1901 or 1902.

Senator REED. And, of course, continues up to the present time?

Mr. JONES. No, sir; it has expired.

Senator REED. When did it expire?

Mr. JONES. It expired at the end of 10 years. If they made it in 1901, it expired in 1911; if they made it in 1902, it expired in 1912.

Senator REED. In any event, that voting-trust arrangement was in full force and effect at the time you were made a director?

Mr. JONES. It was.

Senator REED. You could not, therefore, have been elected a director of that company except by the acquiescence and consent, and, indeed, by the direct action, of the voting trustees?

Mr. JONES. That is correct.

Senator REED. Now, the members of that voting trust were who?

Mr. JONES. There was a representative of the Morgan firm—my recollection is that it was Mr. Perkins—and Mr. Cyrus H. McCormick; and, I think, one of the Deering men. My recollection is a little hazy. I never had anything to do with the concern at that time, and my knowledge of the details of the trust was derived only from general conversations.

Senator REED. I am not asking who the voting trust was primarily, but who were the voting trustees at the time you were elected a director? Did not the voting trust consist of Mr. Perkins, Mr. Cyrus H. McCormick, and Mr. Deering?

Mr. JONES. That is my recollection of the voting trustees.

Senator REED. You had no acquaintance with Mr. Perkins at that time?

Mr. JONES. I do not think I had ever met Mr. Perkins at that time.

Senator REED. And you had no acquaintance with Mr. Deering at that time?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir; I had known Mr. Deering for many years, slightly. He is a Chicago man.

Senator REED. You had no business relations with him?

Mr. JONES. None whatever.

Senator REED. Did Mr. Deering ask you to become a director?

Mr. JONES. He did not.

Senator REED. The request came to you alone from Mr. Cyrus H. McCormick?

Mr. JONES. It did.

Senator REED. And having had a long acquaintance with him and his family, and being upon terms of personal intimacy and friendship with them, you accepted the position?

Mr. JONES. I did.

Senator REED. After you did accept the position, did you hold it merely in a nominal way, or did you take an active interest as a director?

Mr. JONES. I took an active interest as a director.

Senator REED. Did you attend the meetings of the board?

Mr. JONES. Every meeting that was held where I could go to it I attended.

Senator REED. How frequently did the board meet?

Mr. JONES. Every two weeks. When I first joined the board, however, quite a number of meetings used to be held in New York, for the reason that there were a good many directors living there. When the meetings were held in New York I did not go on unless I was notified that there would be business requiring the full board, in which case I went on. But during the period I have been a member of the board I think I have not missed more than two or three meetings of all the meetings that have been held.

Senator REED. Whether they were held in Chicago or in New York?

Mr. JONES. No, sir; I mean those held in Chicago. I did not attend all of those held in New York.

Senator REED. How many meetings would you say were held in New York that you were not present at?

Mr. JONES. There were a good many. I went to New York twice to attend the meetings, and I could not tell you just how many meetings of the board were held in New York that I did not attend.

Senator REED. Could you approximate it in any way?

Mr. JONES. Well, there were probably a dozen or more meetings that I did not attend.

Senator REED. Do you know in what year they were held?

Mr. JONES. They were held, I should say, some of them in 1909, 1910, and 1911.

Senator REED. Do you think that you were present at all meetings at which important business was transacted?

Mr. JONES. Well, I could not be sure of that, Senator, because if a meeting were held in New York and I was advised that important business was to be transacted, I was usually so notified, and, as I say, I went there twice to attend meetings.

Senator REED. Were you present at any meetings at which the officers were authorized to acquire any new companies or properties belonging to outside companies?

Mr. JONES. No, sir; I was not.

Senator REED. Were you present at the meeting at which the stock was raised from $120,000,000 to $140,000,000?

Mr. JONES. I was present at a meeting at which that was considered. I think I was present at the meeting at which the final vote was taken. I am sure I was present at a meeting at which it was considered.

Senator REED. Did you favor that proposition?

Mr. JONES. I did.

Senator REED. You did favor that proposition?

Mr. JONES. I did.

Senator REED. Were you present at the meeting at which the stock dividend of $20,000,000 was declared?

Mr. JONES. I was.

Senator REED. Did you favor that or oppose it?

Mr. JONES. I did; I favored it.

Senator REED. Where are the minutes of the directors' meetings?

Mr. JONES. They are kept by the secretary.

Senator REED. Yes; they are kept by him; but where are they actually now—do you know—Chicago?

Mr. JONES. I suppose they are in Chicago.

Senator REED. Did you ever examine the books to see whether they kept pretty full record of the meetings—the minute book?

Mr. JONES. I never examined the book itself, Senator.

Senator REED. You have heard them read, however, at meetings?

Mr. JONES. I have. The minutes of previous meetings are always read.

Senator REED. Could you say in a general way whether these minutes were pretty fully kept?

Mr. JONES. I think they were fully kept.

Senator REED. Who is the present secretary and custodian of these records?

Mr. JONES. Mr. Howe was secretary for a number of years. He is a brother-in-law——

Senator POMERENE (interposing). Give his full name, please.

Mr. JONES. Richard F. Howe, I think, was the secretary.

Senator REED. You say he was a brother-in-law of whom?

Mr. JONES. He was a brother-in-law of the Deerings.

Senator REED. Yes.

Mr. JONES. He was secretary for a good many years.

Senator REED. Is he the present secretary?

Mr. JONES. No, sir; Harold McCormick is the present secretary.

Senator REED. He resides in Chicago?

Mr. JONES. He does.

Senator REED. Where are the offices of the International Harvester Co.?

Mr. JONES. In the Harvester Building.

Senator REED. In Chicago?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator REED. And does the secretary keep his office and records there?

Mr. JONES. Yes; at least I so understand.

Senator REED. I suppose there is a considerable force of employees there?

Mr. JONES. Very large.

Senator REED. Are you familiar with the contracts that the harvester company made with agents for the sale of machinery, the output or product of this company?

Mr. JONES. I was not familiar with them in detail. I knew in a general way about them. I had nothing to do with the drafting of them, if that is what you mean. I never passed upon the terms or effect of them.

Senator REED. Not from a lawyer's standpoint. What I am trying to get at is, you are an active member of the board; and did you undertake to become familiar with the business that you had to transact?

Mr. JONES. Not in its details; not as an executive officer of the company would be expected to do.

Senator REED. Not in its minute details, but its general policies.

Mr. JONES. Yes; its general policies.

Senator REED. Now, you knew, did you not, that there was a form of contract which was entered into between the harvester company and various agencies that it used?

Mr. JONES. Yes; I did.

Senator REED. Have you seen that form of contract?

Mr. JONES. I have seen them. As I say, I had no occasion to examine them critically. I knew what the general policy was with regard to the sales, and I assumed that the contract carried out the general policy.

Senator REED. What I understand you to mean—and I want to be sure that I get you right—is that while you did not undertake to minutely examine into the question of the contract between the harvester company and A, B, or C, the agent, or the absolute details, you did know the general form of the contract, the general character and nature of the contracts that the company made with its agents?

Mr. JONES. Yes; I think I can say that is true. Coming into the corporation as a going concern, I would not have quite the same familiarity with those things as if I had come into a new concern, and the things were formed right under my attention.

Senator REED. Yes.

Mr. JONES. The concern was a going concern when I went into it.

Senator REED. You received no compensation as a director at all?

Mr. JONES. I got the ordinary director's fee for actual attendance, $20 for each meeting; that was absolutely all.

Senator REED. Not a very tempting consideration, so far as money goes?

Mr. JONES. No, sir; and when I went to New York I got my actual traveling expenses and no more.

Senator REED. Yes. What were these plans with reference to employees—this participation plan? What was that, in a general way?

Mr. JONES. Well, the plan has been modified repeatedly. In a general way there was what would be called a profit-sharing scheme. There was a bonus given to the employees of the company who had rendered notably good service, and they were permitted to purchase—the company had a fund of the stock—they were permitted to take a certain amount in cash and a certain amount in the stock of the company—which most of them did.

Senator NELSON. What kind of stock, common or preferred?

Mr. JONES. The common stock.

Senator NELSON. Not the preferred?

Mr. JONES. The stock that the company bought and distributed was common stock.

Senator NELSON. Excuse me, Senator REED, for breaking in.

Senator REED. Certainly. Now, Mr. Jones, you say that after you came in no new plants or properties were acquired?

Mr. JONES. Well, I did not understand that to be the question. The company has purchased new plants. It has not purchased other concerns; no going concerns. I understood that to be your question.

Senator REED. When you say it has purchased new plants, just what do you mean?

Mr. JONES. It has purchased several plants in Europe. There was a plant in Canada when I became a member of the board; but it has been enlarged, and the company has built a very large number of warehouses and properties of that sort since I became a member of the board; in fact, at pretty nearly every meeting there was some property being acquired. When you asked me before, I thought you meant taking in other concerns.

Senator REED. I think my question was couched in that way.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Senator REED. Now, you say you acquired plants in Canada. Do you mean that the company built new plants in Canada?

Mr. JONES. Built new plants.

Senator REED. It established new institutions?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Senator REED. It did not buy out some that were in existence?

Mr. JONES. No, sir.

Senator REED. Now, what kind of plant was it that it built or established in Canada?

Mr. JONES. The large Canadian plant manufactures harvesters and mowers and also some of what is known as side lines, the new lines of business.

Senator REED. What are the side lines?

Mr. JONES. Such implements as manure spreaders and cream separators and implements of tillage. The original line was harvesters and mowers entirely.

Senator REED. This plant now that is built in Canada makes manure spreaders, does it?

Mr. JONES. I am not sure whether the Canadian plant makes manure spreaders or not. I do not think it does.

Senator REED. They did acquire the manure-spreader rights after you came in?

Mr. JONES. No, sir; they were manufacturing manure spreaders when I joined the company. That is my recollection.

Senator REED. Well, I am a little confused about that.

Mr. JONES. I was mentioning that merely as one of the so-called outside——

Senator REED (interposing). Side lines?

Mr. JONES. Side lines.

Senator REED. But now, coming to the plant in Canada, and just sticking to that for a moment, could you state pretty accurately what that plant is, and what it does, and how much it has invested in it, and so on?

Mr. JONES. I could not tell you how much is invested. It is intended to supply primarily the Canadian trade in reapers and mowers; they have a pretty heavy tariff there.

Senator REED. And also to manufacture these side lines?

Mr. JONES. Such side lines as are manufactured there. It was also contemplated originally that they should do so.

Senator REED. Do you know how much capital was invested in this plant?

Mr. JONES. Well, I could not tell you. Since I have been a member of the board of the company there have been spent there—well, I should say several hundred thousand dollars; I do not carry those details in my mind.

Senator REED. In Canada?

Mr. JONES. In Canada.

Senator REED. Where is the plant located?

Mr. JONES. At Hamilton.

Senator REED. Is there only one plant there?

Mr. JONES. Only one manufacturing plant. The company has warehouses, of course, in other portions of the Dominion.

Senator REED. Scattered all over the Dominion?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Senator REED. Does this plant manufacture enough to supply the trade in Canada?

Mr. JONES. No, sir; it does not. It manufactures most of it, but not all of it.

Senator REED. It manufactures a majority of the farming implements used in Canada?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir; it manufactures a considerable part.

Senator REED. Would you say the majority?

Mr. JONES. I should say the majority.

Senator REED. Now, the parent company—that is, the company in Chicago—also ships into Canada largely also, does it?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir; what is required over and above the manufacture of the Canadian plant.

Senator REED. Taking in connection the output of the Canadian plant and the output of the harvester company in this country, what proportion of the consumption of farming implements in Canada are supplied by the institution as a whole?

Mr. JONES. By the Canadian institution or——

Senator REED (interposing). By both. What proportion of the entire consumption in Canada was supplied by the International Harvester Co., either through its plants in Canada or through its plants in the United States?

Mr. JONES. I could not tell you the exact proportion; but as you know the Massey & Harris Co., which is a Canadian corporation, has a very large trade, a larger trade in Canada than the International Harvester Co., as I understand it.

Senator NELSON. Let me ask you this question, to clear it up: Under what name are you operating in Canada?

Mr. JONES. The International Harvester Co. of Canada.

Senator NELSON. You have no other name?

Mr. JONES. I spoke of the Massey & Harris Co.; that is a Canadian concern.

Senator NELSON. Oh, yes.

Senator REED. I understood you to say a moment ago—and if I am not correct, please put me right—that the International Harvester Co., through its Canadian plant, sold the majority of the agricultural implements in Canada?

Mr. JONES. Oh, no, sir; I meant the majority of those that are sold by it.

Senator REED. By it, yes; in the lines it covers.

Mr. JONES. Exactly.

Senator REED. And in the lines it covers, through its Canadian plant, with the addition of the machinery which is sent from this country by the International Harvester Co.; in those lines what proportion of the trade do you cover in Canada?

Mr. JONES. I can not answer that question. There are several vigorous competitors over there. My recollection is that the Massey-Harris Co. has the larger part of the Canadian trade.

Senator REED. That is, taken altogether.

Mr. JONES. Taken altogether.

Senator REED. But now you have certain lines in which you have a larger trade than in others, have you not?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir. The smaller implements, I have not very much of a guess how much of the smaller implements like cream separators, etc., are sold over there. I know more about the harvesters.

Senator NELSON. I suggest that you refer to the harvesters and mowers, Senator REED.

Senator REED. Yes; let us get at it in another way. You speak of certain lines in which you have a larger trade. What were those lines—harvesters and mowers?

Mr. JONES. Harvesters and mowers.

Senator REED. What else?

Mr. JONES. Harvesters and mowers would be the larger element.

Senator REED. How about plows?

Mr. JONES. The International Harvester Co. does not carry plows; it does not deal in plows; it is not a plow-manufacturing company.

Senator REED. Well, in harvesters and mowers, which were the original line of activity, the principal lines of activity of the harvester company, you make those in Canada?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator REED. What proportion of the harvesters and mowers used in Canada are supplied from your Canadian plant or from your United States plant?

Mr. JONES. That is, what proportion of the total Canadian consumption?

Senator REED. Yes.

Mr. JONES. I could not answer that question. I do not really know.

Senator REED. It is a majority, is it not?

Mr. JONES. I should say not; but that may be correct. The Massey-Harris Co. is a very powerful company.

Senator REED. What were the lines in which you meant to say, a while ago, that you did supply a majority of the implements in Canada?

Mr. JONES. My statement was, or my understanding is, that the majority of the implements which the International Harvester Co. sells are made in Canada.

Senator REED. Oh.

Mr. JONES. But it is not a majority of the Canadian trade.

Senator REED. Then I misunderstood you.

(Thereupon, at 11.10 o'clock a. m., the committee took a recess, to reassemble in the room of the Committee on the Philippines at 11.30 o'clock a. m., at which time the following proceedings were held:)

Senator HITCHCOCK. Senator Reed, will you proceed with your questions?

Senator REED. You can not give us any accurate statement in regard to the output of the Canadian factory?

Mr. JONES. I can not. I have not——

Senator REED (interposing). You can not give us any accurate statement in regard to the shipments from the United States by the International Harvester Co.?

Mr. JONES. I can not give you the proportions of the total shipments made by the International Harvester Co. that come from the States. I have not followed that at all.

Senator REED. Would you have any difficulty in getting that for us?

Mr. JONES. Not the slightest.

Senator REED. By wire?

Mr. JONES. I do not think there would be the slightest difficulty about getting it.

Senator REED. Your company has a plant for manufacturing purposes at what point in Canada?

Mr. JONES. Hamilton.

Senator REED. And you spoke of warehouses; do you know at what points they have warehouses?

Mr. JONES. There are a large number, Senator. There are warehouses in the larger centers of Canada and the United States.

Senator REED. Well, I was speaking about Canada only.

Mr. JONES. Well, in Canada there are warehouses scattered over all places like Winnipeg and the larger shipping centers—the company has warehouses at those centers.

Senator REED. Do you know the aggregate, or approximately the aggregate, of your sales in Canada—say, the last year?

Mr. JONES. I can not give you that.

Senator REED. Do you know the aggregate amount of money that you have invested in Canada, in plants, warehouses, and in the Canadian business?

Mr. JONES. I can not give you that from recollection. As I say, most of the investments were made there before I became a member of the board, and I have only picked up such information in connection with questions that would arise from time to time before the board. I can not give you that.

Senator REED. You spoke of having European plants. How many European manufacturing plants have you?

Mr. JONES. There is a plant at Norkopping in Sweden. There is a plant in Russia

Senator NELSON. At Odessa?

Mr. JONES. No; there is a warehouse at Odessa, but not a manufacturing plant. The manufacturing plant is at—well, I will remember the name in a minute. It is a Russian name. There is a manufacturing plant in France. Those manufacture the parts of the harvesters; those are harvester manufactories primarily.

Senator REED. Mowing machines, too?

Mr. JONES. Mowing machines and harvesters.

Senator REED. Are there any other European plants than those three?

Mr. JONES. No, sir; there is no other European plant that is actually going.

Senator REED. Well, have you some——

Mr. JONES (interposing). Property has been acquired in Hungary, but the plant is not completed; it is only in process.

Senator REED. They are building it now?

Mr. JONES. Well, the plant has been acquired and the tracks are laid; the actual building has not been begun, but the property has been acquired.

Senator REED. Did you buy the factory out there or did you build one?

Mr. JONES. The European factories have been built mostly de novo. In the case of the Russian plant, the buildings were in existence for an entirely different line of business, and the property was bought and transformed into an entirely different factory. There was no harvester or mower business purchased in Europe.

Senator REED. Have you established any plants in Asia?

Mr. JONES. None.

Senator REED. Or in Japan?

Mr. JONES. None at all in the Orient.

Senator CRAWFORD. Any in South America?

Mr. JONES. No; no plants in South America; no manufacturing plants.

Senator REED. Can you tell me where the Russian plant is——

Mr. JONES. Norkopping is the——

Senator NELSON (interposing). Norkopping is in Sweden.

Mr. JONES. That is in Sweden; yes. I am trying to think out that Russian name.

Senator REED. Well, you may get it later, perhaps; it is not material. When were the steps taken to acquire this plant in Hungary?

Mr. JONES. About a year and a half ago.

Senator REED. You knew all about that?

Mr. JONES. I did.

Senator REED. And sanctioned it?

Mr. JONES. I did.

Senator NELSON. Had these plants in Russia and France and Sweden been started before you became a member of the board?

Mr. JONES. They had all been started but had not been finished; that is, we made appropriations to them from time to time; but my recollection is that the initiation of the enterprises were all under way before I became a member of the board, excepting the one in Russia.

Senator REED. Let us take the plant in France; when was that initiated?

Mr. JONES. I could not give you the date.

Senator REED. How much has been done on that in the way of enlarging it, or enlarging its sphere of activity, since you became a member?

Mr. JONES. Not so much as Norkopping and the Russian plants.

Senator REED. Now, of course, it is perhaps a little indefinite and hard to get it definite——

Mr. JONES (interposing). Do you mean how much money we have appropriated? I do not remember.

Senator REED. Let us take the Russian plant. When was the acquisition of that?

Mr. JONES. I can not tell you the date of the inception of that, either.

Senator REED. What has been done with that since you became a member of the board in 1909?

Mr. JONES. We have made several appropriations, providing for certain plant extensions and providing for machinery, equipment, etc.

Senator REED. Extending the plant?

Mr. JONES. Extending the plant and extending the equipment of the plant that was there.

Senator REED. What has been the extent of that?

Mr. JONES. In money?

Senator REED. Yes; what would you approximate?

Mr. JONES. I do not think I could tell you that.

Senator NELSON. May I ask a question there, Senator Reed, to clear the matter up?

Senator REED. Certainly.

Senator NELSON. When you start in foreign countries, do you incorporate in those countries, or how do you get the right to do business there?

Mr. JONES. It depends on the country, Senator. There must be an ownership in all the countries; that is, either a corporation organized under the laws of those countries, or what we call ordinarily a partnership. For instance, in Hungary corporations are not allowed to operate at all. There there are certain trustees. They have a peculiar form of organization there that is substantially our form of copartnership; that is, the property has to be held in the name of individuals as trustees, but no corporation can be organized.

Senator NELSON. But in France and Sweden and Russia they are corporations?

Mr. JONES. Corporations.

Senator NELSON. You incorporate under the laws of those countries?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Senator NELSON. But you hold a majority of the stock?

Mr. JONES. We hold all of the stock.

Senator NELSON. But you have to get some of the citizens of those countries to act as officials?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. And to hold some stock?

Mr. JONES. That is, qualifying shares; yes, sir; but the substantial holdings are in the International Harvester Co.

Senator REED. In other words, in all of these places—and when I say all of these places I mean all of these European places where you have established yourselves—the harvester company is in control of the business and owns substantially all of it?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator REED. Does your company own it, or the individual members of the company?

Mr. JONES. The company holds—do you mean——

Senator REED (interposing). The International Harvester Co.

Mr. JONES. The International Harvester Co.; yes, sir.

Senator REED. Holds the interest?

Mr. JONES. That is, you understand that in 1912 the foreign business was put in a separate corporation?

Senator REED. Yes.

Mr. JONES. The International Harvester Co., which was the original organization. Before the suit was begun, with the concurrence of the legal department, the foreign plants, and foreign business, and the so-called outside lines, there was a corporation organized under the name of the International Harvester Corporation.

Senator REED. With the concurrence of what legal department?

Mr. JONES. Of the law department of the Government.

Senator REED. Of the United States Attorney General's Office?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator REED. You organized a separate corporation to run the European business?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir; to take over the European business.

Senator REED. To take over the European business.

Senator NELSON. May I ask a question? You have two domestic corporations, have you not—the New Jersey corporation, and then a corporation succeeding the Milwaukee corporation?

Mr. JONES. Well, that was the International Harvester Co. of America. That was the selling agency.

Senator NELSON. That was the Milwaukee company?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. That is the selling agency of the International Co. of New Jersey?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. The one manufactures and then turns it over to the other to sell?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. But they are all controlled by the same interest?

Mr. JONES. They are.

Senator REED. When you organized this European company—what is the name of it—the one to take over the European business?

Mr. JONES. The International Harvester Corporation.

Senator REED. The International Harvester Corporation, and not "company"?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator REED. Now, who constitutes the International Harvester Corporation? Who holds that stock?

Mr. JONES. The stock originally of the International Harvester Co. was reduced by substantially one-half at the time of the organization of the International Harvester Corporation and stock of the International Harvester Corporation was issued for the amount so reduced.

Senator REED. And put in the hands of these same voting trustees?

Mr. JONES. No, sir; that was after the voting trust had expired.

Senator REED. Then, in whose hands was it put? Who actually came in possession of that stock upon the incorporation?

Mr. JONES. Those who surrendered the stock, by the amount by which it was reduced by the original International Harvester Co., received stock of the International Harvester Corporation.

Senator REED. Well, who are those people, the principal ones that surrendered this stock and took the stock of the International Harvester Corporation?

Mr. JONES. Who are the individuals?

Senator REED. Yes; the principal ones.

Mr. JONES. Well, the McCormick family and the Deering family together.

Senator REED. And Perkins and the Morgan interests?

Mr. JONES. And Perkins and the Morgan interests have some stock, as I understand. I am not familiar with the details of the stock holding.

Senator REED. Well, just to get at it so that we can get it all in a nutshell—I take it there is really no dispute about the facts?

Mr. JONES. None whatever.

Senator REED. This stock, the great majority of it, was owned by the International Harvester Co., by the Morgan interests, represented by Mr. Perkins, by the McCormick interests, and by the Deerings; that is the situation, is it not?

Mr. JONES. If you state it in the reverse order I can say yes; it was owned largely by the McCormicks and the Deerings, and the Morgan interests held a certain amount of stock.

Senator REED. Those three interests had a majority of the stock in that company?

Mr. JONES. That is my understanding.

Senator REED. Yes. Now, subsequently you organized a sales company known as the International what?

Mr. JONES. You are referring now to the International Corporation?

Senator REED. No; the sales company.

Mr. JONES. That is the International Harvester Co. of America. That was not subsequently organized; that was one of the original companies.

Senator REED. One of the original companies?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator REED. Now, these same three interests control a majority of that, do they not?

Mr. JONES. My understanding is that the stock of the International Harvester Co. of America is owned by the International Harvester Co.

Senator REED. Owned by the parent company?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir; controlled by them.

Senator REED. When you organized the International Harvester Corporation to take over the European business, did these same three interests continue to control the majority of the stock in that?

Mr. JONES. The stock of the International Harvester Corporation was, as I said, issued to those whose stock had been reduced in the amount which it had been reduced in the International Harvester Co.

Senator REED. You told us a moment ago that the International Harvester Corporation stock——

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Senator REED (continuing). Was given in lieu of International Harvester Co. stock and to the people who surrendered International Harvester Co. stock?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Senator REED. Now, what I am coming to is this: Did not that leave the control of the International Harvester Corporation to these same three interests?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Senator REED. The Morgan interests, represented by Mr. Perkins and the Deerings and the McCormicks. That is correct?

Mr. JONES. That is correct.

Senator POMERENE. If I may clear up my thought, the stock of the International Harvester Corporation was not in fact then held by the American companies?

Mr. JONES. By the American companies?

Senator POMERENE. Yes.

Mr. JONES. No, sir; held by the stockholders.

Senator REED. Now, as a matter of fact, these three corporations, in their practical operation, are all run under one general management and control, are they not?

Mr. JONES. Well, strictly that is not correct; substantially it is—that is, the same persons——

Senator REED (interposing). Manage all of them?

Mr. JONES. Yes; legally they are entirely separate entities.

Senator REED. I understand. But the controlling interest is the same in all three of them?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Senator REED. Can you tell us how much the stock of the International Harvester Co. was reduced at the time you separated the European business from the American business?

Mr. JONES. My recollection is that it was reduced by $30,000,000 of each kind of stock, $30,000,000 of common and $30,000,000 of preferred; $60,000,000, divided substantially into half.

Senator REED. And for that $60,000,000 of stock there was stock issued in the European ventures?

Mr. JONES. That is correct.

Senator REED. So that there is now $60,000,000 invested—at least, so far as the face of the stock goes—in the European investments?

Mr. JONES. European and Canadian; outside of the United States.

Senator REED. Oh, that takes in European and Canadian?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator REED. Now, the Canadian holdings also went into the International Harvester Corporation?

Mr. JONES. The corporation; yes.

Senator REED. Who are the officers of the International Harvester Corporation?

Mr. JONES. Mr. Cyrus H. McCormick is——

Senator REED (interposing). What is he?

Mr. JONES. He is the president.

Senator REED. Cyrus H. McCormick?

Mr. JONES. They have the same officers as the company.

Senator NELSON. Are you a director of that?

Mr. JONES. I am.

Senator REED. Cyrus H. McCormick is president of the International Harvester Co., and he is——

Mr. JONES. And also of the corporation.

Senator REED. I will get to that in a moment. And who is the vice president of the International Harvester Co.?

Mr. JONES. There are two vice presidents, James Deering and Harold McCormick.

Senator REED. Harold McCormick? And can you name the directors?

Mr. JONES. I can; give me a little time, and I will name them all. They are Cyrus H. McCormick, Harold McCormick, James Deering, Charles Deering, Richard F. Howe, J. H. Jones—that is the other Jones.

Senator NELSON. Mr. Jones represents the Plano interests?

Mr. JONES. He is known as "Plano Jones." That is his common name. He is substantially the owner of the Plano plant.

Senator NELSON. The Plano plant; yes.

Mr. JONES. J. J. Glessner.

Senator NELSON. That is an Ohio company?

Mr. JONES. That used to be the Warder-Bushnell Co.

Senator NELSON. Yes.

Mr. JONES. And Mr. Perkins.

Senator NELSON. He was not manufacturing any machines before he went into this business; he was not manufacturing any harvesters?

Mr. JONES. I believe not.

Senator POMERENE. Perhaps it was political machines. [Laughter.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Thomas Lamont, John G. Wilson, Edgar A. Bancroft, John A. Chapman, E. H. Gary. The resident director in New Jersey was elected to succeed a gentleman who died, and just for the moment his name escapes me. I have not yet mentioned myself as a director.

Senator REED. Are these same gentlemen you have named the officers and directors of the International Harvester Corporation?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator REED. They hold the same relative positions in the International Harvester Co. of America—the sales company?

Mr. JONES. No, sir; that is not correct. I am not a director of that company, and I must say that I can not offhand give you the officers of it.

Senator REED. Anyway, the stock of that company—that is, the International Harvester Co. of America—is all owned by the International Harvester Co.?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator REED. So that the control of the International Harvester Co. of America by the officers of the International Harvester Co. means the control of the International Harvester Co. of America, because the stock is held by the International Harvester Co.?

Mr. JONES. Directly or indirectly that is true.

Senator REED. That is true.

Senator NELSON. Are you a director in what you call the sales company—the Milwaukee company?

Mr. JONES. No, sir; I am not.

Senator NELSON. You are only a director in the New Jersey company and the foreign company—those two?

Mr. JONES. That is all. You speak of the foreign company. That includes Canada; outside lines—the corporation and the company.

Senator NELSON. That is what I meant.

Senator REED. Now, this taking over of the European business by the new company which you have formed, called the International Harvester Corporation, occurred after you became a director?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator REED. And also the building of the plant in Hungary?

Mr. JONES. The acquiring of the properties in Hungary.

Senator REED. The acquiring of the properties in Hungary occurred after you became a director?

Mr. JONES. It did.

Senator REED. And in those two enterprises that I have just discussed you were consulted and you were a party to it?

Mr. JONES. I was.

Senator REED. Have you got any such investment as $60,000,000 in these European plants?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir; in the business that is controlled by the International Harvester Corporation there is an investment of $60,000,000.

Senator REED. An actual investment of $60,000,000?

Mr. JONES. That is, I get that on the authority of the auditors and accountants; I have not myself examined into it.

Senator REED. Is any part of that good will, or is it actual investment?

Mr. JONES. No, sir; actual investment. There is no good will represented in the balance sheets of the International Harvester Co. or the corporation at all.

Senator REED. What was the purpose of organizing, or, rather, I mean of establishing these plants in Europe?

Mr. JONES. The purpose was this, Senator: The International Harvester Co. was about to have suit brought against it, and negotiations had been going on between the Department of Justice and the International Harvester Co., and it was evident that the question of the legality of the International Harvester Co. would have to be tested; and there were certain lines concerning which the Government made no charges whatever, and after investigating all the circumstances connected with them they agreed that any bill that was to be filed ought not to reach enterprises that were in no way in controversy. That applied to all of the foreign business, which was highly competitive; and to all of the so-called outside lines—Canadian business, which is strictly and highly competitive; and those properties were segregated from the reaper and harvester business, which was a storm center.

Senator REED. You say the European business was highly competitive, and therefore was left out. Am I to understand from that that the business in this country—the United States—was not highly competitive?

Mr. JONES. Well, Senator, you know that just about as well as I do, I think. There is a very vigorous competition going on, growing daily.

Senator REED. I do not understand why you drew that distinction, then.

Mr. JONES. Well, it was claimed by the Government that a practical monopoly had been established by the organization of the International Harvester Co. It was not claimed that any semblance of monopoly had been established anywhere or any restraint of trade of any kind accomplished by the establishment of foreign plants or any Canadian plants, but that they were all to the good, and that it would be a misfortune from their point of view to allow proceedings that were intended to reach only these lines, which were claimed to be monopolistic, to interfere with business that was not in any way claimed to be monopolistic or in restraint of trade.

Senator REED. Those negotiations were carried on with the Department of Justice. Do you remember who represented your company in those negotiations?

Mr. JONES. I know that in part the general counsel of the company, Mr. Edgar A. Bancroft and Mr. Tom P. Wilson, the special counsel of the company, had repeated conferences in the matter.

Senator REED. Did Mr. Perkins have anything to do with it?

Mr. JONES. I do not think he had anything to do with it.

Senator REED. Who was the Attorney General with whom these negotiations were had?

Mr. JONES. Mr. Wickersham.

Senator REED. Mr. Wickersham?

Mr. JONES. It was all carried out with him under the previous administration.

Senator REED. Do I understand that Mr. Wickersham, before bringing his suit against the harvester company had negotiations with the officers of the company with reference to what was to be the scope of that suit, and that time was allowed the harvester company to set its house in order and segregate its European business from its American business?

Mr. JONES. No, sir; I would not state it in just that way.

Senator REED. Just how would you state it?

Mr. JONES. Certain proposals were made by the International Harvester Co. to meet the objections of the Government growing out of the organization of the Inter. tional Harvester Co. which did not meet the views of the administration, and when it becar evident that the company and the Government could not agree on a program that would meet the views of the Government the status of the foreign business of the company was explained to the Attorney General and his assistants; and the status of the Canadian business and the so-called outside business, concerning which there was no controversy; and the proposal to delimit, as it were, the controversy and to confine it to the lines of business that were claimed to be monopolistic was explained. And I want to say that Mr. Wickersham, the Attorney General, did not assume to bind the Government by any agreement, but the proposal, or what the company proposed to do, was explained to the Attorney General and his assistants, and it was carried out with their full knowledge of what was being done, and when the bill came to be filed it was filed against the International Harvester Co.

Senator REED. Were you familar with the negotiations while they were being carried on?

Mr. JONES. In a general way; I had nothing to do with them.

Senator REED. I understand; but they were laid before the board of directors from time to time, and you knew of them?

Mr. JONES. I did.

Senator REED. You knew of the contention which the Government was making, that the International Harvester Co. and its allied corporations constituted a combination in restraint of trade in this country?

Mr. JONES. I did.

Senator REED. And you took part in the segregation of the European business from the American business?

Mr. JONES. I did, sir.

Senator REED. Thus to that extent eliminating that company from any attack which might be made by this Government?

Mr. JONES. I did.

Senator REED. And you knew that the Government contended that this was a combination in restraint of trade?

Mr. JONES. That the International Harvester Co. was; yes, sir.

Senator REED. Yes. And it contended that even after the segregation of the European business?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir; but not as to the European business.

Senator REED. No; not as to the European business; but it contended that the business here in the United States was still a combination in restraint of trade and a monopoly?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator REED. Now, Mr. Jones, what did you do, if anything, toward endeavoring to secure a dissolution of this monopoly here in the United States which the Attorney General was charging and complaining was a monopoly?

Mr. JONES. Well, I can not claim, Senator, that I advanced any specific proposal for the segregation. Various suggestions were made to the Attorney General in an attempt to meet his views as to what ought to be done.

Senator REED. Well, did he state what his views were? Did you understand what the Attorney General's views were?

Mr. JONES. No, sir. I had no personal interview with the Attorney General.

Senator REED. Well, I mean you got it from your representatives and attorneys and agents who came and laid it before the board of directors?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator REED. You then know in a general way what the Attorney General's views were?

Mr. JONES. I knew in a general way that the Attorney General insisted that the corporation would have to be split up, and the question was to what extent it would have to be split up.

Senator REED. Did you ever make any motion to the board of directors to split it up and make it conform to the requirements of the Attorney General?

Mr. JONES. I did not.

Senator REED. Did you ever vote for such a proposition?

Mr. JONES. Such a proposition never came to a vote.

Senator REED. Such a proposition never came to a vote?

Mr. JONES. No, sir.

Senator NELSON. Was not a proposal made by the Department of Justice, under this administration, for you to break it up into different parts?

Mr. JONES. Under the present administration?

Senator NELSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES. So far as I have ever heard, no such proposal was ever made. The suit was a pending suit when this administration came in.

Senator NELSON. No; but was not a proposal made, either by the International Harvester Co. of New Jersey or by the Department of Justice, or both combined, to break up this combination into some of its constituent elements?

Mr. JONES. I never heard of such a proposal made to or by the present administration; and so far as my information goes, no negotiations have been had at all with the present administration along those lines.

Senator NELSON. Were there such negotiations with the former administration?

Mr. JONES. Those are the negotiations I have just been telling about—with the former administration.

Senator NELSON. What did it strand upon, the refusal of the corporation to accede to the request of the Attorney General?

Mr. JONES. Well, I do not remember that there was any specific proposal which was turned down; but the negotiations were protracted for a considerable time, and it was evident that the administration would insist upon a more drastic separation than the authorities of the International Harvester Co. believed to be just.

Senator NELSON. Excuse me, Senator REED, for interrupting you.

Senator REED. Certainly. Well, coming to that, the point I am trying to arrive at is this: The Attorney General made certain requirements or demands which were laid before your company?

Mr. JONES. In an informal way.

Senator REED. Yes; through your attorneys or representatives?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Senator REED. And those requirements or demands of the Attorney General were rejected by the company, and thereupon the suit was filed. That is the situation is it?

Mr. JONES. That is substantially correct.

Senator REED. Yes. Can you tell us, Mr. Jones, of any effort that you made to bring about the dissolution of this corporation in such a way as to meet the requirements or requests or demands of the Attorney General?

Mr. JONES. I took no steps of my own, Senator, at all in the matter. The matter was in the hands of the counsel of the company, and they reported from time to time what they were doing and what their convictions were, and what their conclusions were; and I will say frankly that, so far as I had any judgment, I concurred in their judgment, and I assume responsibility for doing that.

Senator NELSON. Senator Reed, before you go on further, I would like to know the status of that suit.

Mr. JONES. That suit was submitted to the court last November in the Minnesota circuit.

Senator NELSON. Yes.

Mr. JONES. Before Judges Sanborn, Hook, and Adams.

Senator NELSON. Has a decision been rendered?

Mr. JONES. No, sir; it has not. It is still pending. They have the case under advisement.

Senator POMERENE. Submitted on it merits?

Mr. JONES. Submitted on its merits on final hearing.

Senator REED. Do you recall when the Misssouri Supreme Court decided that the International Harvester Co. was a trust in restraint of trade?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Senator REED. What time was that?

Mr. JONES. The decision came out—the suit had been instituted before I became a director—the decision came out, I should say, about three years ago; that is, the first decision handed down. Then there were applications for rehearing. I am referring to the first decision.

Senator REED. The opinion was handed down three years ago, and then there were applications for rehearing; and an appeal was then taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, something like two years and a half ago, was it not?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator REED. So that two and a half years ago you knew of that decision of the Supreme Court of Missouri?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Senator REED. And you knew that the International Harvester Co. was a combination in restraint of trade?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir; under the laws of Missouri.

Senator REED. Yes; under the laws of Missouri. And the laws of Missouri are somewhat similar in their general aspect to what we call the Sherman antitrust law, are they not? The case involves substantially the same issues that are now involved in the case in Minnesota in the United States court?

Mr. JONES. Well, of course, they come under not the same issues, because the charges are under entirely different jurisdictions and statutes.

Senator REED. I understand. But what I am trying to get at is, you are a lawyer, and I understand you are a very fine one, and I have no doubt that you are.

Mr. JONES. I make no such claim at all, sir.

Senator REED. Well, I have been so told on very high authority. The Missouri trust statutes are, of course, in different phraseology from the statutes of the United States; but the Missouri trust statutes forbid combinations in restraint of trade, and in their general aspect reach the same things that are reached in the antitrust statutes of the United States. That is true, is it not?

Mr. JONES. They seek to accomplish the same results.

Senator REED. Yes; and in general it is the same class of statute.

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator REED. So that you did know some two and one-half years ago at least that the final judgment of the Supreme Court of the State of Missouri was to the effect that the International Harvester Co. was a trust and combination in restraint of trade?

Mr. JONES. I did; yes, sir.

Senator REED. You had that light, and you also had the opinion of the Attorney General of the United States at the time that you acquiesced in the opinion of your lawyers which you just spoke of?

Mr. JONES. I did.

Senator REED. I want to go back and take up another topic. You stated that the International Harvester Co. had not in the United States acquired any new plants, except such as it had itself built, since your connection with it?

Mr. JONES. I did.

Senator REED. But you also stated that it had taken on some side lines, I believe?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Senator REED. Can you tell us what they were?

Mr. JONES. I mentioned some of them a little while ago. They were manure spreaders and wagons.

Senator NELSON. Cream separators?

Mr. JONES. Yes; cream separators.

Senator REED. Binding twine?

Mr. JONES. Binding twine; yes, sir. That is quite an extensive industry. There are certain small implements of tillage that I am not familiar with.

Senator NELSON. Corn planters?

Mr. JONES. I am not sure.

Senator NELSON. Corn cultivators?

Mr. JONES. I think they have a line of corn planters. I do not have the familiarity that an executive officer would have with the details of the business; but I think they have some of those smaller tillage implements. They do not handle plows, I know.

Senator REED. Mr. Jones, the manure spreader is rather a recent invention, is it not, as a successful one? I mean, within the last few years?

Mr. JONES. Within the last 12 or 15 years, I should say.

Senator REED. You acquired the patents on that, did you not?

Mr. JONES. I presume we did, but I do not know the facts.

Senator REED. Was there not a plant at Waterloo, Iowa, making manure spreaders, and did you not acquire that plant?

Mr. JONES. Well, now, that I have no knowledge of. It is possible that we did.

Senator REED. You say you did take them on; do you know how you took them on?

Mr. JONES. I am not sure about that. What I had in mind, Senator, if you will let me explain——

Senator REED (interposing) Certainly; I want you to be just as plain as you can.

Mr. JONES. What I had in mind was, I was speaking of the Canadian plant, which is manufacturing lines of goods which are held to be competitive; that is, comparatively competitive. What I had in mind was that since I have become a member of the board no such plants or businesses had been acquired by the company as were charged by the Government to be monopolistic in their tendency, or tending to restrict trade.

Senator REED. Yes.

Mr. JONES. For instance, the wagon business. The company acquired the Weber Wagon Co.'s works They had been acquired, I think, a year or two before I became a director. They manufacture wagons.

Senator NELSON. Did you not acquire the Osborne Co.?

Mr. JONES. The Osborne Co. was acquired a long time before that, Senator.

Senator REED. Coming back to the other question: I understand you now to say that what you meant a little while ago by your answer—and I do not think you are at all in conflict with it—was that when you said that no new plant had been acquired you meant plants that were in competition with the business the Harvester Co. then did?

Mr. JONES. Exactly.

Senator REED. But you did not mean to say it had not acquired plants which manufactured certain articles of farming machinery which up to that time you had not engaged in extensively?

Mr. JONES. Exactly.

Senator REED. And one of these is the manure spreader, as you recall?

Mr. JONES. I am not sure of that. I know the company acquired the Weber Wagon Works, but I am not sure what the origin of the manure spreader was.

Senator REED. When you acquired the Weber Wagon Works you were not acquiring a competitive plant, because you did not handle wagons?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir; that is true.

Senator REED. But when you did acquire the Weber Wagon Works you began to handle wagons?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator REED. And you think the Weber Wagon Co. was acquired before you became a director?

Mr. JONES. My recollection is that it was. I know I went there shortly after I became a member of the board.

Senator REED. Where are that company's works located?

Mr. JONES. Outside of Chicago, about 10 miles.

Senator NELSON. They make buggies also?

Mr. JONES. No, sir; they make a truck. It was known as the Weber Wagon Works, and I do not think that they make buggies, although I am not sure. I have gone through the plant, but I do not know. I am not sure about that. I saw nothing when I went through the plant except the wagon works proper. It may have been changed since then.

Senator NELSON. When did you take up the business of cream separators?

Mr. JONES. That was a considerable time before I had anything to do with the company. They are made at the Milwaukee plant.

Senator NELSON. Yes. What name do you give your cream separators that you put on the market?

Mr. JONES. It is used as the International.

Senator NELSON. The Laval?

Mr. JONES. No; the Laval is another cream separator. This was called the "International"; but whether it retains the original name I am not sure.

Senator REED. Well, you must be selling under a different name, because I have not seen a cream separator labeled "International Harvester Company."

Mr. JONES. Well, all of the implements turned out by the International Harvester Co. have the name of the company somewhere on them.

Senator NELSON. Yes.

Mr. JONES. For instance, the Weber wagon is still known as the Weber wagon, but it bears the name of the International Harvester Co. on it.

(Thereupon, at 12.20 o'clock p. m., the committee took a recess until 1.30 o'clock p. m.)

AFTER RECESS.

The committee reassembled at the expiration of the recess.

Senator LEE. Mr. Chairman, there is some little difference of opinion about the nature of this proceeding. I am a new Member of the Senate, and I told Senator SHAFROTH that I looked upon these proceedings as part of the executive business of the Senate, and thought they were clearly confidential. He seemed to think that that was the proper view to take of it. I spoke to Senator REED about it afterwards, and he did not understand it that way. I understood you to say so, Senator SHAFROTH?

Senator SHAFROTH. That is an executive session.

Senator LEE. It seems to me we ought to clear that up. There is nothing in the rules about this being confidential. It is only an inference from the fact that the proceedings of the Senate on executive nominations are confidential; and this is theoretically a part of the proceedings of the Senate. I thought I would like to ask the chairman to lay that matter before the committee.

Senator REED. I do not understand how you got that impression about what I said, Senator LEE.

Senator LEE. I thought you did.

Senator REED. You asked me some question about it a while ago. I did not mean to say that these hearings were public.

Senator LEE. They are certainly not confidential, as far as other Members of the Senate are concerned.

Senator REED. I say I did not mean to say that they were public. I do not know how you got that impression.

Senator HITCHCOCK. Here is what I told the newspaper men: The meeting was not an open meeting, but after its conclusion I would give them a statement as to what the committee had done, and I did that the other day.

Senator SHAFROTH. I think it is all right to state what conclusion the committee has come to.

Senator LEE. Yes.

Senator SHAFROTH. But it does seem to me that this is part of the executive business of the Senate.

Senator HITCHCOCK. It is better, I think, to have the chairman, or some designated member, make a statement to the newspaper men.

Senator REED. Well, they are liable to make all sorts of wild statements. One newspaper man came to me and asked a question, assuming that certain things had transpired here in the committee that had not transpired at all, and I said, "There is nothing of that kind that has taken place," and passed on.

Senator LEE. There is another question analogous to this which is being discussed on the floor of the Senate. Senator BORAH is now making a motion to make public all the discussion and evidence relative to the pending Nicaragua treaty, and Senator WILLIAMS says that the statements of the witnesses were made on the confidential basis; and there you have it.

Senator HITCHCOCK. In that case, Senator BORAH has avoided attending meetings of the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, and he proposes to bring up his matter of his own knowledge. There he is standing for a principle, the public discussion of the question. In this case, when the reporters came to me, I said that Mr. Jones had been meeting the committee and had been explaining to the committee his relation with certain business enterprises, and that his remarks this morning were confined to the harvester company. This is news so far, but as to the details of it, I think that is a matter for the committee only.

Senator LEE. I do not suppose it makes the slightest difference to Mr. Jones whether it is public or not, but I think from the standpoint of the Senate it is better to have it confidential.

Senator REED. My opinion about this is that the best thing to do, absolutely, for all concerned, Mr. Jones, the President, this committee, and the Senate, is to give absolutely what takes place here, which is the truth, and not have a lot of newspaper fellows guessing at wild things. There has been nothing which has taken place here this morning that Mr. Jones is not willing to stand for before the world and that we are not willing to stand for before the world; and everything has been pleasant and proper, and I always find that it is a good deal better to just let them know——

Senator SHAFROTH (interposing). Well, after it is through, we can then determine as to whether or not it should be made public.

Senator LEE. I would not feel at liberty to give it out.

Senator CRAWFORD. Primarily, the notes taken here are for our service and use, and when we get through with them they are for the use of the Senate.

Senator NELSON. We can have this record printed for use in the executive session.

Senator CRAWFORD. Certainly; and that is primarily where they belong, rather than to the public, unless there is some reason why they should be given publicity.

Senator SHAFROTH. If the Senate were to remove the secrecy of the session or the proceedings or the minutes, that would be all right. That is often done, or sometimes done.

Senator REED. My experience with these newspaper people is that when you have got a perfectly clean bill of health it is better to tell them all about it—absolutely the facts—and not let them draw a lot of inferences. I do not care, as far as I am concerned; I am telling you what I honestly think. If you take the Committee on Foreign Relations, Senator Lee, you have an entirely different proposition. They are dealing there with questions of the utmost delicacy, involving the relations between our country and another country. It may be very necessary that some third country should not know what our dealings are. But this is a different proposition, and, as far as I am concerned, I do not care; but I think you are right to have an expression from the committee, Mr. Chairman.

Senator HITCHCOCK. Yes; we will take that up at the close of the hearing.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENT OF MR. THOMAS D. JONES, OF CHICAGO, ILL.

Mr. JONES. May I make an additional explanation in the matter of the relation with the previous Attorney General? I am not sure I made it entirely clear; and I want, in justice to Attorney General Wickersham, to say that these matters, of transacting foreign business, and the outside lines, through the International Harvester Corporation, were fully explained to him; but they did not undertake to O. K. the transaction. That is, the company understood that they reserved any right which the United States might have at any future time. If I gave the impression in my previous testimony that there was any O. K.ing of the transaction, I would like to have that corrected.

Senator REED. I do not think you did.

Mr. JONES. I do not think I did. But I want to make it sure, in justice to Mr. Wickersham, that he did not assume to pass upon that, but saw no particular objection to the transaction. But still it was especially understood that the right of the Government was reserved to bring any future action that they might see fit to bring.

Senator CRAWFORD. In effect, it was simply segregating and putting over in a class by itself that business?

Mr. JONES. Absolutely, that is all there was to it; but he did not assume to pass upon, as being permissible, or did not assume to permit anything of that sort.

Senator REED. Mr. Jones, before adjournment, we were discussing the question of the acquisition by the company of various subsidiary farming implements. Now, you had spoken of the manure spreaders and the wagons, and the——

Senator NELSON. Cream separators.

Senator REED. The cream separators, and the binding twine, and cultivators.

Mr. JONES. Well, there is a corn shredder.

Senator REED. There is a corn shredder—in a general way, and in order to abbreviate this, because I do not believe any one of us cares much for the minutiæ of it—the company, if I understand you correctly, has been since your connection with it, from time to time, acquiring additional farming implements or instruments that are used in connection with the farm, and that has been a part of its general policy?

Mr. JONES. Yes. I think very few of them have actually been acquired; some of them have been extended since I became a member. I think the Weber Wagon Co. had been acquired before that.

Senator REED. I think you are correct in saying that the Weber Wagon Co. had been acquired before you become a member; I gathered from the petition that it was acquired before that.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Senator REED. But it has been the policy of the company to gradually reach out, and when it saw an instrument that was used on the farm that it was convinced was a good thing it added it to the business of the company, if it could do it upon terms which it thought were advisable.

Mr. JONES. I think that is a fair general statement.

Senator REED. So that as a result of this policy at this time the company has become engaged in the production, in addition to harvesters and reapers, of a very large number of those implements which the farmers use?

Mr. JONES. I should say a considerable number of them. Some of the most important farming implements the International Harvester Co. has never gone into. For instance, plows is a very large industry, thrashing machines is a very large industry, which the International Harvester Co. has never gone into.

Senator REED. You do not make those?

Mr. JONES. No.

Senator REED. You do have agency contracts, do you not, by which the agent you employ, the agencies that you establish, participate to some extent in the profits of the company?

Mr. JONES. The machines are sold out and out to the agents and they sell the machines.

Senator REED. Yes; but you spoke of a participation arrangement with some of your employees?

Mr. JONES. That has nothing to do with the selling contract.

Senator REED. That has nothing to do with the selling contracts?

Mr. JONES. No, sir; that is merely an attempt to work out a scheme of profit-sharing indirectly.

Senator REED. Now, do these agencies that are established throughout the United States participate in any way in the profit sharing?

Mr. JONES. I do not believe they do, although I can not answer positively about that.

Senator REED. In these contracts that you make with agents—you have seen those contracts I believe you said?

Mr. JONES. I have, although I am not really familiar with the specific terms of them

Senator REED. And I suppose that the contract itself would be the best evidence, and I think we can perhaps get them?

Mr. JONES. They are in the record.

Senator REED. I think so.

Senator NELSON. They are in that Missouri case also.

Mr. JONES. There is no secret about them.

Senator REED. Mr. Jones, what was the capital of the International Harvester Co. before the segregation of the European or foreign business?

Mr. JONES. $120,000,000, $60,000,000 of each kind; $60,000,000 of common and $60,000,000 of preferred stock.

Senator REED. What was it after the segregation?

Mr. JONES. The segregation merely accomplished a division of the existing stock. The stock was increased afterwards, but the $60,000,000 of common stock was divided into $30,000,000 common stock of the International Harvester Co. and $30,000,000 of common stock of the International Harvester Corporation; and the $60,000,000 of preferred stock was divided into $30,000,000 of preferred stock of the International Harvester Co. and $30,000,000 of preferred stock of the International Harvester Corporation.

Senator NELSON. You use the terms "company" and "corporation." Are they two distinct companies?

Senator REED. Yes. One is the American and one is the European company.

Senator NELSON. The European company is the "corporation"?

Mr. JONES. Yes; the corporation.

Senator NELSON. And the New Jersey company is the "company"?

Mr. JONES. The International Harvester Co. of New Jersey manufacture the domestic harvesters and mowers.

Senator CRAWFORD. But it has an identity of ownership all through?

Mr. JONES. Well, it is the same, in the sense that the holders of the stock of the International Harvester Co. are largely the holders of the stock of the International Harvester Corporation; but not entirely the same, because there has been a considerable amount of this stock on the market and transferred. I do not suppose even the officers know to what extent there is an identity of holding.

Senator NELSON. Now, this sales company, the successor to the Milwaukee company, what is the technical name of that?

Mr. JONES. The International Harvester Co. of America.

Senator NELSON. The International Harvester Co. of America; and the manufacturing company is the International Harvester Co. of New Jersey?

Mr. JONES. The International Harvester Co. of New Jersey is the manufacturer of the harvesters and mowers.

Senator NELSON. That is the parent company, is it not?

Mr. JONES. That is the original International Harvester Co.

Senator NELSON. And it is under that head that the others move; that is the main planet, and the other two companies move under that planet?

Mr. JONES. Do you mean the International Harvester Corporation?

Senator NELSON. The Milwaukee company, as I call it, is the sales company of the New Jersey Co.?

Mr. JONES. That is correct. I thought you included the International Harvester Corporation as under the control of the International Harvester Co. The International Harvester Co. has no control of the International Harvester Corporation.

Senator REED. Just to get that in one place in the record, is the International Harvester Co. of New Jersey a corporation organized with $120,000,000 of stock, which was afterwards increased to $140,000,000?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator REED. That is one company. There is the International Harvester Corporation, which was organized to take over the European and Canadian business?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator REED. And it is capitalized at $60,000,000?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator REED. There is in addition to that the International Harvester Co. of America, which is what you have commonly denominated the sales company?

Mr. JONES. That is correct.

Senator REED. Those three companies now constitute what would generally be called the International Harvester Co. and its subsidiary companies?

Mr. JONES. Well, you do not expect me to assent to the fact that the International Harvester Corporation is a subsidiary in any sense whatever. It is an absolutely separate legal entity.

Senator REED. They are separate legal entities; the statement of fact is all that I want.

Senator NELSON. What is the stock of the sales company; how much capital stock have they?

Mr. JONES. My recollection is $1,000,000.

Senator NELSON. How much?

Mr. JONES. $1,000,000.

Senator NELSON. $1,000,000 only?

Mr. JONES. That is my recollection. I have very little to do with that, and I am not a director of it, and I really do not know.

Senator CRAWFORD. Senator Reed, will you let this come in right after your question, that the sales company and the New Jersey company have an identity of ownership; but this company that took over the foreign business embraces stockholders that are not interested in the two American companies?

Mr. JONES. That is perfectly true.

Senator REED. But they have the same officers?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir; they have the same officers as the International Harvester Co., but not the same as the International Harvester Co. of America. As I say, I have nothing to do with the International Harvester Co. of America, not being a director; but I do not think they have the same officers.

Senator REED. Can you tell me the year in which the International Harvester Corporation, the European concern, the foreign concern, was organized?

Mr. JONES. It was organized during the summer of 1912.

Senator REED. And, coming back now to recapitulate a moment, its capital stock was $60,000,000. The capital stock of the International Harvester Co. at that time was $140,000,000. After the separation of the European companies had been effected, what was the capital stock then of the International Harvester Co.?

Mr. JONES. My present recollection is that the increase of capital stock was made after the European and foreign business and the outside lines were transferred to the International Harvester Corporation. My recollection is that at that time all the capital stock of the International Harvester Co. was $120,000,000, $60,000,000 of each kind, and that the increase of capital stock was made after that. That is my present recollection.

Senator REED. Well, I think, Mr. Jones, that you probably are in error about that.

Mr. JONES. I may be.

Senator REED. Because I find it alleged here in the petition [indicating] that in 1910 the capital stock was increased to $140,000,000.

Mr. JONES. 1910? Then that was previous to the organization of the new company.

Senator REED. By the declaration of a stock dividend of $20,000,000. And a little farther on in the tabulation of the stocks of different years I find, under 1910, common stock, $80,000,000, and preferred stock, $60,000,000. I think probably that was done at that time.

Mr. JONES. Yes; that increase had been made previous to that time. My distinct recollection is that the division was made half and half.

Senator REED. Then, in fact, did not you organize the European company in 1910?

Mr. JONES. No, sir; that is not correct. The International Harvester Corporation was organized only a short time before the bill was filed, and my recollection is that the bill was filed during the presidential campaign year, which was 1912.

Senator REED. What I have been asking is this: Assuming, now, that you had $140,000,000 of stock in the International Harvester Co. at the time that the company owned the United States business and the foreign business, how much stock remained of the International Harvester Co. stock? What was its capital stock after you had taken those assets out? Did you reduce it from $140,000,000?

Mr. JONES. There was no reduction of the total capitalization of both companies. That is, the $140,000,000 was divided; the International Harvester Co. of New Jersey stock was reduced, my recollection was, by $60,000,000. Now, it may be that that $20,000,000 of addition having been made before that was also divided, but my recollection was that the capital stock was divided equally, it having been estimated that the foreign business and the outside lines were substantially one-half of the total business.

Senator REED. Then, if I understand you correctly, you did actually have a meeting and reduce the capital stock of the International Harvester Co. after you had taken out the European business?

Mr. JONES. Certainly; that was done by regular stockholders' meeting. That was a matter of public notoriety.

Senator REED. Well, of course I have not followed this closely.

Mr. JONES. Certainly; it was a regular stockholders' meeting and all done publicly.

Senator REED. So that it was reduced?

Mr. JONES. So that it was reduced by the amount that was turned over to the International Harvester Corporation.

Senator REED. I am a little at a loss, Mr. Jones, to understand—I am asking this question with the greatest respect, in order to try to get at the facts—how it came that a man of your standing and property, as I understand, was willing to devote his labor to this enterprise in which you had no real interest—financial interest—and if you have anything further that you want to say about it along that line I should like to hear it.

Mr. JONES. Well, I will be very glad to state it as it struck me at the time. I was requested by friends that were pretty nearly lifelong to help them out so far as I could as a member of the board of the directors of the International Harvester Co. They pretended that they wanted not my assistance as a stockholder or in any financial way, but they were good enough to say that they thought possibly my judgment and experience might be of help to them, and they asked me as a favor to consent to become a director of the corporation.

Senator NELSON. In what way did they ask you to help them out, if any?

Mr. JONES. By consenting to become a director of the corporation and by giving whatever judgment and advice I would be able to give in the transaction of the business.

Senator NELSON. They did not ask you to aid them in any way of dissolving?

Mr. JONES. None whatever.

Senator NELSON. And you did not go in for that purpose?

Mr. JONES. I did not go in for that purpose at all. I would have felt that it was, on the whole, rather selfish and rather cowardly, inasmuch as I had the time, to refuse to do it merely because it was going to involve some trouble; and there are certain features of corporate management that have appealed to me personally. The entire relation of corporations to the public has yet to be worked out satisfactorily, and, while I had not any conceit that I could contribute to any great extent to that problem, it was interesting to me, and from that point of view there was an aspect that rather appealed to me, and that is all the explanation that I can give.

Senator REED. Well, I thought perhaps there was something further.

Mr. JONES. No, sir.

Senator REED. Now, you accorded with the general policies of the company while you were in it?

Mr. JONES. After my election; yes, sir; I did.

Senator REED. And you did not make any effort to stop its practices or change its policies?

Mr. JONES. I knew of no practices in the company after I became a director that I thought in any way in contravention of law.

Senator REED. Or good morals?

Mr. JONES. Or good morals.

Senator REED. In other words, if I get you correctly, Mr. Jones, you simply mean to say this: It is your idea that a corporation organized along the lines in the way that this company is organized is a perfectly proper, legitimate business transaction?

Mr. JONES. That is going further than my answer went.

Senator REED. Well, I do not want to go an inch further than you want to go.

Mr. JONES. Well, let me define my own position in that regard. The attack which has been made upon the International Harvester Co., as represented by the suit, referred primarily to the circumstances attending the organization. It was claimed that in the manner in which it was organized it was a monopolistic enterprise and operated in restraint of trade. Now, with those circumstances which constituted the gist of the charge I had nothing to do.

And you asked me whether I entirely approved of them. I say that that question is to-day pending before the courts, and if the courts say that that was an improper organization I shall be prepared to say that I think so, too.

But you are asking me for an opinion on a question that is now pending before the courts of the United States. When you ask me whether I entirely approve of the entire organization and methods of transacting the business I confine my statement to the transaction of business by the corporation since I became a director.

Senator NELSON. Well, Mr. Jones, I will put the question to you in a brief form. On the whole, you approve the course of this company; you approve the course of this New Jersey company and its two affiliated companies?

Mr. JONES. Since I became a member of the board of directors.

Senator NELSON. And indorse everything they have done since then?

Mr. JONES. Since then.

Senator NELSON. And approve of it?

Mr. JONES. I do, heartily.

Senator NELSON. And do not think they have been in any sense law violators?

Mr. JONES. I do not, sir, since I became a director.

Senator HITCHCOCK. Whose place did you take on the board of directors?

Mr. JONES. Some eastern man.

Senator HITCHCOCK. How did the vacancy occur?

Mr JONES. By resignation. I am not sure whether it was Mr. Hagood or some eastern man.

Senator HITCHCOCK. Was he unsatisfactory to the voting trustees?

Mr. JONES. Not that I know of. I have no reason to suppose so at all. I made no inquiry about that. I was merely told that there was a vacancy and asked to consent to my election to fill the vacancy. I am not at all sure whose vacancy it was.

Senator HITCHCOCK. You think it possible that the vacancy occurred and you were selected as a concession to Mr. McCormick?

Mr. JONES. I have not any reason to think so at all, sir.

Senator HITCHCOCK. Are you interested in business enterprises with Mr. McCormick?

Mr. JONES. Not in the slightest.

Senator HITCHCOCK. In no other way?

Mr. JONES. In no other way whatever, sir.

Senator HITCHCOCK. Are there any other questions? Senator CRAWFORD, have you any questions?

Senator CRAWFORD. Just this: Before Mr. McCormick suggested that you take a place on the board of directors did he give you an outline of the reasons why he wanted you on the board and what particular theories or purposes he had in mind to carry out in connection with this organization and its future plans?

Mr. JONES. No, sir. I have given substantially the entire transaction. He merely asked me, on the score of old and long-standing friendship, to consent to go on the board.

Senator CRAWFORD. And you did not commit yourself to any specific plan?

Mr. JONES. I did not, sir, at all.

Senator CRAWFORD. That is all.

Mr. JONES. And I was not asked to.

Senator POMERENE. There was just one matter that you spoke of that I wanted to inquire a little further about. In speaking about these conferences with the Attorney General, as I understood you, you stated that that portion of the business of the International Harvester Co. which was in foreign countries was highly competitive, and you seemed to distinguish between that and the business in this country, as I inferred?

Mr. JONES. That is substantially correct.

Senator POMERENE. Now, my first question is, What did you mean when you said that the foreign business was highly competitive? Did you mean with business enterprises of a similar nature in those particular countries or did you mean that the business as between American companies who were seeking those markets was highly competitive?

Mr. JONES. Both, sir. In all the countries in which the International Harvester Co had been operating in foreign countries there were local manufacturers of harvesting machines, with the possible exception of Russia. I am not sure whether the harvester and mower trade of Russia had local manufactories or not, but in Sweden and Germany and France it had. There was also, and is to-day, quite a large foreign business by American companies. The Deere Co., for instance, has a large foreign trade in harvesters and mowers. I believe the Massey-Harris Co., of Canada, has a large foreign trade.

Senator NELSON. If you will allow me, the McCormick Co., to my certain knowledge, had an agency at Odessa, Russia, as early as the eighties. The man who was agent for a good many years used to be our county auditor.

Mr. JONES. That is a selling agency.

Senator NELSON. That is a selling agency.

Mr. JONES. They have a warehouse at Odessa, but no manufactories.

Senator NELSON. Yes; they had a big agency at Odessa.

Senator POMERENE. What was your purpose in having these plants built abroad? Was it to avoid the tariff or take advantage of the difference in wage cost?

Mr. JONES. The tariff in some countries was pretty nearly prohibitory, and it is going up constantly. There was another element. Each of these countries that I have mentioned—due either to prejudice or different physical conditions—requires a somewhat different type of machine. Norway, for instance, will not have the regular American machine, and they will not have the machine that will go in Germany or France. There are certain local peculiarities that have to be met with a workout on the ground.

Senator REED. It is pretty hard to place a Norwegian anyhow, is it not, Senator NELSON? [Laughter.]

Senator SHAFROTH. Well, I do not think that a Norwegian is the only one that is hard to place. [Laughter.]

Senator POMERENE. Now, what were the particular distinguishing features, so far as they related to the business of your company here in America, that made them objectionable to the Department of Justice, rather than the foreign business?

Mr JONES. Well, it was charged that in the manufacture and sale of harvesters and mowers a substantial monopoly had been created by the creation of the International Harvester Co., and that it accomplished a restraint of trade. There was no pretense that the foreign branches of the company had produced any such results, nor was there any such result claimed in any of the outside lines. The company had no such proportion of the trade in any of those lines that made it possible to suggest a monopoly. And the foreign trade is a large and growing trade; it has been growing a good deal faster than the domestic trade; and to mix up a trade that was new and that had been built up without any pretense whatever of any monopolistic condition—to keep it mixed up and make it abide the result of the decisions of the court with regard to local domestic business—would not have resulted in any good public interest, and it would result in ultimate public loss, without apparently any motive.

Senator POMERENE. What proportion of the American trade did the International Harvester Co. have?

Mr. JONES. Of the American trade?

Senator POMERENE. Yes; of the American trade.

Mr. JONES. Well, it has been going down steadily. When the corporation was organized my recollection is that it was charged that something like 75 per cent—was it? The percentage has been going down steadily, and my recollection is that it is now somewhere in the neighborhood of 50 per cent. I am referring now to harvesters and mowers.

Senator POMERENE. When you expressed your approval of the transactions and business methods of the International Harvester Co. since your connection with it, did you have in mind and give your approval in that statement to the original organization of the company?

Mr. JONES. I did not, sir.

Senator POMERENE. Or any of the transactions of that company between the date of its organization and the time when you became a directing force in the company?

Mr. JONES. I limited my statement, or meant to do so, strictly to the transactions of the company after I had become a director.

Senator POMERENE. The purpose of my question was to make that perfectly clear.

Mr. JONES. I want to make that clear.

Senator POMERENE. If I understand you, then, you meant simply this, that assuming that the business as then organized was organized in conformity to and not in violation of the law, anything which was done after that, so far as you were cognizant of it, was in harmony with what you believed to be the law?

Mr. JONES. Precisely; that is just what I meant to state.

Senator POMERENE. I will put another question just to get your viewpoint. As a general proposition, do you approve of the combination of these large manufacturing concerns that are in the same line of business, so as to control the trade of a country so large as this country? You can answer that question or not, just as you wish.

Mr. JONES. Why, that opens up a very interesting question; and there might be some circumstances under which it would be industrially proper, and then circumstances under which it would be injurious. Now, whether in the particular case it was justified or injurious is a question now pending before the courts.

Senator REED. Upon which you would not care to express an opinion?

Mr. JONES. I would rather not. It is a legal question.

Senator POMERENE. Well, I will not ask it.

Senator REED. Assuming that the primary organization was within the prohibition of the law and in violation of it, and the organization having been effected, and the concern being then and there carrying out the purpose of their organization, would you consider that in carrying out the purposes for which the illegal organization was effected, you would not be violating the law?

Mr. JONES. Well, let me answer that in this way: It might be held that by the formation of the International Harvester Co. of New Jersey a power had been lodged in that company which no company ought to have—a monopolistic power. It might be true, however, Senator, that such power so lodged had never been injuriously exercised.

Senator NELSON. It might be true, but it is not true, Mr. Jones.

Mr. JONES. Well, that is a question concerning which, as I say, the courts have to decide. I am trying to answer fairly Senator REED's question, whether a corporation which would be conceded to have been a monopoly when created——

Senator REED (interposing). To have been organized in defiance of the law.

Mr. JONES. Well, to have been organized in defiance of law, it might well be that such a corporation, never having exercised that power, competition will grow up inevitably, provided injurious practices are not carried out, and competition might spring up in the course of time which would completely destroy and nullify any monopolistic tendency. As a matter of fact, I think that the record shows that the competition of the International Harvester Co. has grown every year, and is to-day vigorous.

Senator REED. That is not exactly the point.

Senator CRAWFORD. Let him finish. Had you finished?

Senator REED. Pardon me; I did not mean to interrupt.

Mr. JONES. I had substantially finished.

Senator REED. It is more an ethical question than anything else; but assuming that a concern is organized in defiance of the law, having certain specific purposes, namely, to engage in trade and commerce; that this organization is illegal; do you feel that a man is then warranted in going on and conducting that concern, which, from its very inception and from the very nature of its organization, is illegal? Would it not be his duty to insist upon its disorganization?

Mr. JONES. Let me ask you, does not your question assume that the corporation is using a power which it illegally acquired by its organization? I say frankly, without any reservation at all, that I have felt that the business as transacted by the International Harvester Co. since I became a member is not objectionable to law in any way nor inimical to public interests.

Senator REED. It is charged in this bill [indicating] that the company when it was originally organized only controlled the binder, harvester——

Senator NELSON (interposing). That is, four or five companies.

Senator REED. That the company, when it was first formed, controlled about 75 per cent, I believe it is, of the binder and mower business, and a much smaller per cent of other agricultural implements; but that it had been increasing its holdings from time to time until at the date this petition was filed it was charged that—

"At least 90 per cent of the harvesters and grain binders, and 75 per cent of the mowers, and over 50 per cent of the binding twine annually produced and sold in the United States are the products of the International Harvester Co., and are sold through the International Harvester Co. of America, as herein described.

"There are only three or four manufacturers of harvesting machinery in the United States other than the International Harvester Co. These, in comparison with it, are small; and as their business does not embrace the entire United States, in many sections of the country the International Harvester Co. has complete monopoly of the harvesting machinery."

Now, it is a fact, is it not, that you are increasing your holdings, increasing the output of your factories, and increasing the number of agricultural implements constantly, and are still doing it?

Mr. JONES. No, sir. I think you will find that the record disproves those allegations. The company did acquire—Senator NELSON mentioned the Osborne Works.

Senator NELSON. What?

Mr. JONES. The Osborne Works. The company did acquire one or two plants after the original organization, and by such acquisition——

Senator NELSON (interposing). They acquired one up in New York, I think.

Mr. JONES. The Osborne Co.

Senator NELSON. The Osborne Co.?

Mr. JONES. Yes. Now, they did increase their output somewhat in that way; but during the last six or seven years the proportion of the business in harvesters and mowers has been steadily and rapidly decreasing, and it is now less than the original 75 per cent that was charged there in the petition.

Senator HITCHCOCK. What is the proportion of the business? How is it in the aggregate, without regard to the relation?

Mr. JONES. The harvesting and mowing machine business is not on the increase. That has been a stationary business for some years. All of the unoccupied lands in the country pretty nearly are taken up, and the increase has been in the Canadian Northwest, where new land comes into cultivation. The increase in the business has been largely in these outside lines. It has been a fact proved in the record that the harvesting machine and mower business has been for a number of years, certainly, stationary, if not slightly recedent; and the expectation is that it will still further recede.

Senator NELSON. Does not that come from the fact that the raising of small grain has been stationary?

Mr. JONES. That is it exactly. It has been the small grains that have been stationary; the people have been going into the dairy business.

Senator NELSON. What companies have been interested in the manufacture of harvesters and mowers?

Mr. JONES. The John Deere Co. is a very powerful corporation.

Senator NELSON. The John Deere Co. is operating through your company?

Mr. JONES. Oh, no, sir.

Senator NELSON. I meant the Deering Co.

Mr. JONES. Oh, the Deering machine is a part of the International Harvester machine.

Senator NELSON. That is what I meant.

Mr. JONES. But the John Deere Co. is a very powerful organization.

Senator NELSON. That is a great plow company?

Mr. JONES. That is a great plow company; but they are manufacturing an enormous number of harvesters and mowers.

Senator CRAWFORD. Well, is the Plano Co. in your company?

Mr. JONES. Yes; the Plano is a part of the International Harvester Co.

Senator NELSON. Then they took in another company from Ohio in addition to the Osborne Co.; what was that named?

Senator POMERENE. The Warder Glessner Co.

Mr. JONES. Yes; that was a part of the original consolidation, I think.

Senator NELSON. I did not mean to interrupt Senator Reed's question.

Senator REED. Some of the plants which you have acquired have been dismantled, have they not, and ceased to operate?

Mr. JONES. I do not think any plants have been dismantled. The articles manufactured at the plants, in some instances, have been changed; some of these side lines. For instance, the plant at Milwaukee, the tractor engines are built there, and the cream separators and, I think, the shredders.

Senator NELSON. Well, you have discontinued that as a harvester and a mower plant?

Mr. JONES. Yes; we have discontinued it as a harvester and mower plant.

Senator NELSON. Did you not take in one at Minneapolis? Was not a company there manufacturing harvesters and mowers?

Mr. JONES. At Minneapolis?

Senator NELSON. Yes.

Mr. JONES. I have no recollection of it. I do not remember any plant up there that was taken in; there may have been one. If so, it was in the early years.

Senator REED. You took in the Akron Works, at Akron, Ohio?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator REED. You acquired that from the Alden Miller Co.?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator REED. They manufactured the Buckeye mowing machine or harvester. They discontinued the manufacture of that, did they not?

Mr. JONES. I am not sure of that.

Senator POMERENE. I may say that that concern went into the hands of a receiver, and was later sold out by the receiver, and I think it was after that that your company became the possessor of it.

Senator REED. After it was sold out?

Senator POMERENE. After it was sold out.

Mr. JONES. That was before my connection with the company, and I can not pretend to have any knowledge of it at all.

Senator HITCHCOCK. Mr. Jones, what are the annual profits of your company before the payment of interest? Just the profits of operation.

Mr. JONES. My recollection is that the last annual report showed that, after the payment of the 7 per cent dividend on the preferred and 5 per cent on the common stock, there was—I am very poor at carrying figures in my head—I think the total profits above the dividend and surplus are something like $14,000,000.

Senator HITCHCOCK. Now, is it true that before the organization of this company the individual concerns were only making $10,000,000?

Mr. JONES. Before the organization altogether? I really can not tell you about that. I never went into that end of it at all.

Senator HITCHCOCK. I notice from something that I have here that I was looking over [indicating], the hearings, that the total profits of the McCormick, the Deering, the Warder B. & G., and the Plano Co. aggregated $10,283,000.

Mr. JONES. But you must bear in mind that since then pretty nearly all of these outside lines have been instituted, and these profits that I have mentioned included all the foreign business, which has all sprung up since the organization of the International Harvester Co. in 1901.

Senator HITCHCOCK. Where did the additional capital come from?

Mr. JONES. Do you mean the additional $20,000,000? The $120,000,000 was in that original company.

Senator HITCHCOCK. Where did the additional capital come from to do this much larger business?

Mr. JONES. The surplus each year has been turned into capital.

Senator HITCHCOCK. No new capital has been brought in?

Mr. JONES. No new stock, except that $20,000,000 stock dividend.

Senator NELSON. When was that stock dividend declared?

Senator REED. In 1910.

Mr. JONES. Somewhere about 1910.

Senator NELSON. That was after you became a director?

Mr. JONES. Yes; I became a director in 1909.

Senator NELSON. You joined, then, in declaring that $20,000,000 stock dividend?

Mr. JONES. I did.

Senator NELSON. After they had received 7 per cent on their preferred stock and 5 per cent on the common stock, you joined in declaring the $20,000,000 stock dividend in addition?

Mr. JONES. I did; representing the surplus actually available for it.

Senator HITCHCOCK. Is that not one of the evils of this consolidation in restraint of trade, Mr. Jones, that it does result in wringing larger profits out of the consuming public?

Mr. JONES. Well, it sometimes results that way, and it sometimes results just the opposite way. There are unsuccessful combinations, and there are successful ones. I do not think that you can say that all the combinations have wrung larger profits out of the public; and there were a number of years when the corporation did not pay the dividends I have mentioned. There were four or five years after the company was organized in which the company did not declare more than 4 per cent.

Senator NELSON. On the common stock?

Mr. JONES. On the common stock.

Senator NELSON. But the preferred stock always paid 7 per cent?

Mr. JONES. My recollection is that it did.

Senator CRAWFORD. Does this increase come out of the increased price the consumers pay, or does it come out of enlarging the business, or does it come out of the reductions or economies that result from these consolidations? We hear statements in support of each one of these propositions. What is your opinion about it?

Mr. JONES. I think the Missouri case covers that. I think that the Supreme Court of Missouri found that the company had not increased to the consumer the cost of the machines, as a judicial determination of that fact—and I believe it is the fact. They have not increased the cost of the machine to the consumer equal to the actual cost of manufacturing. They have been able to effect certain economies. They get their raw materials, and they have their large selling expenses divided with their other lines.

Senator NELSON. Well, they have subsidiary companies owning timberlands and manufacturing timber, and owning iron ore and manufacturing pig iron?

Mr. JONES. They have. The Wisconsin Steel Co. is the subsidiary that furnishes the raw material.

Senator NELSON. Yes; the iron?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir

Senator NELSON. And what is the company that procures the wood?

Mr. JONES. I think it is called the Deering Co. It is down in Missouri. They have certain large timber tracts down there.

Senator NELSON. Yes.

Mr. JONES. It is at a place called Deering, I know; and I am not sure what the subsidiary itself is called.

Senator NELSON. Well, those subsidiary companies, of course, are owned by the parent company?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. And they furnish the supplies?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir; the raw materials

Senator CRAWFORD. Well, it is that efficiency in organizing this thing clear down to the raw materials that causes the greater economy in production?

Mr. JONES. Undoubtedly; in part.

Senator CRAWFORD. The prices have not been reduced in any of these implements?

Mr. JONES. Well, they have not been advanced in any of these implements, and they have not been very much reduced. The cost of manufacture has gone up; the cost of raw material, of course, has gone up in that industry, like everything else.

Senator NELSON. Now, let me call your attention to this, Mr. Jones: Before the organization of this company, each one of these constituent companies—the Deering, the Plano, the McCormick, and all those other companies—each would have their own sales agent in a town?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. Now, in this organization you cut all of that out and have only one sales agent in a town?

Mr. JONES. No, sir; that is a mistake, Senator NELSON.

Senator NELSON. It is not a mistake, of my own knowledge.

Mr. JONES. As a matter of fact, that was found to be not feasible. It was found that the Deering machine could not be handled by McCormick agents, and there are selling agents in pretty nearly all the large centers.

Senator NELSON. Well, that is the jobbing centers. But when you come to deal with the farmers—now, I live in a small town of 3,000 people, the county seat, and we have only one sales agent there representing the company, and he has handled it for years, and before that we had five or six.

Mr. JONES. Well, in the larger centers there are——

Senator NELSON (interposing). In the jobbing and distributing centers?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. But where you come to deal directly with the farmers, instead of having four or five or six agents you have only one. Those are the facts?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator HITCHCOCK. Mr. Jones, I would like to get this in a more compact form than I have had it before. I notice by the hearings in this case, in which your company and the directors were defendant, that the profits of the companies which composed the original company when it was created had prior to that time been paying an aggregate of $10,283,686?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator HITCHCOCK. And that the profits of your company in 1910 were $16,700,000, which is a 60 per cent increase in the profits; and I understood you to say that no new capital had gone into the enterprise at all?

Mr. JONES. The surplus or—no; no new capital; that is correct.

Senator HITCHCOCK. And you started with a surplus of $2,000,000, and by 1910 the surplus had increased to $16,000,000. Now, the question I put to you is just a question to get your point of view—whether you do not think that is exacting, or that that indicates that the corporation was formed for the purpose of exacting excessive profits from the consuming public?

Mr. JONES. Well, frankly, I say that I do not think that the International Harvester Co. has exacted undue profits from the public. I think the Missouri decision—the opinion of the court, rather—bears out that contention. However, that will be passed upon by the court which now has the matter under consideration.

Senator REED. The Missouri court?

Mr. JONES. I say I think the Missouri court found that there was no increase of cost to the producer. It has been quite a while since I read the decision, but I think that is the purport of it.

Senator REED. I thought you meant to say that that opinion would be passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. JONES. Oh, no.

Senator REED. It has been passed upon already?

Mr. JONES. Yes; but it was not on the merits; they did not go into the merits.

Senator POMERENE. They went into the constitutionality of the Missouri statute?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator HITCHCOCK. Are there any other questions?

Senator SHAFROTH. I want to ask a question. Mr. Jones, since you have been connected with the International Harvester Co. has there been any watered stock?

Mr. JONES. Not a dollar.

Senator SHAFROTH. All the stock that has been issued has represented money, has it?

Mr. JONES. Absolutely.

Senator SHAFROTH. Has any of it represented property put in at a valuation?

Mr. JONES. No, sir.

Senator SHAFROTH. This increase of the capital stock that you were questioned concerning—from $120,000,000 to $140,000,000—was that $20,000,000 of increase represented by cash?

Mr. JONES. It was represented by a surplus, which was represented by properties actually owned by the company.

Senator NELSON. Senator SHAFROTH, that was represented by the 20 per cent stock dividend.

Senator SHAFROTH. Well, if a stock dividend has been issued, I do not see why it can not be——

Mr. JONES (interposing). The surplus was reduced by just so much.

Senator SHAFROTH. There was a surplus of more than $20,000,000 at that time?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator SHAFROTH. And when that $20,000,000 of surplus was set aside it was in payment of the stock?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator HITCHCOCK. What year was that?

Senator NELSON. Can you not see, Senator SHAFROTH, that they capitalized the profits of the concern and made it all the harder for the poor farmer, who had to buy the implements and who had to pay the dividends on that increase?

Senator SHAFROTH. It may be that he paid for it, but this is no fictitious stock at all.

Senator REED. After the stock was issued at $120,000,000, there was no new money afterwards added to the concern from the outside?

Mr. JONES. No, sir.

Senator REED. There was afterwards added, however, $20,000,000, called a stock dividend?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator REED. Was there $20,000,000 in money accumulated by the company for which this stock was issued?

Mr. JONES. There was.

Senator SHAFROTH. During what years was that?

Mr. JONES. From 1901 to 1910.

Senator REED. Was it in actual money, or in properties?

Mr. JONES. In property. Some of it was in cash, but most of it was in properties.

Senator REED. In other words, your company had proceeded, from time to time, and had extended plants from time to time and bought plants from time to time, and it kept books, and they ascertained after a while that, according to their books, they had $20,000,000 more assets than they had of stock, and thereupon they issued stock for that. That is what you mean, is it not?

Mr. JONES. Well, it was a surplus. The assets that constituted the original capital stock might be diminished or increased; but a surplus is a technical setting aside of certain profits that are not declared as dividends.

Senator REED. They had set aside a surplus?

Mr. JONES. Exactly.

Senator REED. That surplus was not in cash; it was in property?

Mr. JONES. Principally in property.

Senator REED. Well, in getting that, do you know whether they went back and counted off the wear and tear of plant—the depreciation of plant, and the obsolescence of plant?

Mr. JONES. There is a very stringent depreciation charge each year.

Senator REED. Let us go into this question of capital. As a matter of fact, the total capital of all these five companies when they went in, at the time they organized this concern with $120,000,000 of capital, did not aggregate $11,500,000, did it?

Mr. JONES. What is that?

Senator REED. The total capital of all the companies that were amalgamated together to make the International Harvester Corporation, when the first $120,000,000 was issued, did not aggregate $11,500,000?

Mr. JONES. Do you mean the capital stock and not the capital? As a matter of fact, Senator, all the properties that were turned in in payment of the capital stock issued by the International Harvester Co., by inventories made by outside appraisers, and pretty rigidly scrutinized, because each company scrutinized the properties of the others, showed an actual surplus of cash value above the entire capital stock issued of $120,000,000.

Senator REED. Have you ever examined those papers yourself?

Mr. JONES. I have seen a statement of the inventories. That is a matter that is undisputed, that those inventories upon which the capital stock was ultimately fixed showed an actual cash surplus value over and above all the stock that was issued for it.

Senator REED. Well, I had arrived at a very different conclusion.

Mr. JONES. Well, I think you are mistaken.

Senator REED. I may be. If I am, I want to get it right. But the allegations of this bill are that in 1902 "the aggregate annual output of five separate concerns manufacturing and selling harvesting machinery and twine, including binders, mowers, reapers, rakes, etc., amounted to over 85 per cent of all the harvesting machinery, and more than 50 per cent of the binding twine sold and produced in the United States. These concerns were the McCormick Harvesting Machine Co., an Illinois corporation, capital stock $2,500,000, with factories located at Chicago, Ill."

Now, this is the original organization.

Senator SHAFROTH. When was that originally organized?

Senator REED. In 1902.

Senator SHAFROTH. Do you mean that $2,500,000 was all the capital stock that the McCormick Co. had in 1902?

Mr. JONES. Stock.

Senator REED. I mean that this petition says that that was all the stock of the company, $2,500,000.

Senator SHAFROTH. How long had that company been in existence at that time?

Senator REED. I do not know.

Senator SHAFROTH. It may have been accumulating property for 20 or 40 years before that.

Senator REED. "The Deering Co., with factories at Chicago, Ill."

Now, there is no value given there.

"The Plano Manufacturing Co., an Illinois corporation, capital stock $1,000,000, with factory at West Pullman, Ill.

"The Warder-Bushnell & Glessner Co., an Ohio corporation, capital stock, $3,000,000, with factories at Springfield, Ohio.

"The Milwaukee Harvesting Co., a Wisconsin corporation, capital stock, $1,000,000."

Senator NELSON. Assuming, Senator REED, that the Deering Co. was as big as the McCormick Co.——

Senator REED (interposing). I am going to give you the Deering Co.'s figures, because it is stated in the record of the suit, if I can get my eyes on it.

Senator LEE. I think the witness has already stated that he did not enter into an examination of that original valuation.

Mr. JONES. Well, I will state without any hesitation and absolutely that the record of these legal proceedings shows that at the time the International Harvester Co. was organized inventories, made elaborately and by outside concerns having no interest in it, showed an actual surplus of cash value above the total stock issued, namely, $120,000,000.

Senator SHAFROTH. Then there has never been any watered stock in this company?

Mr. JONES. Not a dollar of watered stock.

Senator NELSON. Let me call your attention to one fact—and it appeared in the bill; these implement companies had been accustomed for years to sell on time and take the notes of farmers. Now, that paper was turned over to the company and stock was issued for $40,000,000 for that paper. That is what the bill shows. But that paper was worth something. They collected those notes, and they issued stock for them. The notes went to the new company, and the new company collected them and got the money out of the farmers.

Mr. JONES. I do not quite understand. Do you mean that there was a duplication of stock issued for the notes and then stock issued for the cash?

Senator NELSON. No; stock issued for the notes, and the notes went to the new company.

Senator SHAFROTH. If the notes were paid, what would be the difference?

Senator NELSON. They got their money back.

Senator SHAFROTH. They would have to get their money back in order to make their capital intact.

Senator NELSON. But that did not go into the question of manufacturing.

Senator SHAFROTH. They put in $20,000,000.

Senator HOLLIS. Working capital.

Senator SHAFROTH. They put in $20,000,000 of working capital.

Senator REED. I wanted to know whether the physical properties and cash were $120,000,000?

Mr. JONES. $120,000,000, yes; including plants and manufactured stock and credits outstanding—debts actually owing, farmers' notes, and property.

Senator SHAFROTH. Did it include any good will?

Mr. JONES. Not a dollar of good will.

Senator CRAWFORD. Or promoters' fees?

Mr. JONES. Not a dollar of promoters' fees.

Senator NELSON. Oh, yes; Morgan & Co. received promoters' fees.

Mr. JONES. Well, promoters' fees; there was a fee paid for organization expenses.

Senator REED. $3,451,863.34 was paid to J. P. Morgan & Co.

Mr. JONES. But there was property in actual cash covering that turned over to the company. I state positively that the records show that the property turned over to the company exceeded by actual cash value the entire stock issued, including promoters' fees and all.

Senator REED. Here is a company organized that takes over a lot of property. The physical properties that it takes over and the notes and bills receivable that it takes over aggregated $120,000,000. Now, when they get through with their organization they take $3,400,000 and turn it over to Morgan & Co.

Mr. JONES. Your statement is wrong. It aggregated not $120,000,000 but some $130,000,000.

Senator HITCHCOCK. When you say "property" what do you refer to?

Mr. JONES. Plants——

Senator HITCHCOCK. I find that the valuation which the actuaries and accountants found of the McCormick property was $39,668,157; and upon the Deering plant, $27,237,195; upon the Plano plant, $3,068,667; and I have not been able to find the other one, the Warder, B. & G. Co.

Senator NELSON. The Warder, Bushnell & Glessner Co.

Mr. JONES. Those figures do not include any outstanding bills receivable; there were an enormous amount of farmers' notes outstanding.

Senator HITCHCOCK. The plants themselves fall something short of $70,000,000.

Mr. JONES. Well, the outstanding notes of the International Harvester Co. are enormously large.

Senator REED. This is the allegation:

"That of this stock ($120,000,000), $53,400,000 was apportioned among the owners of the McCormick, Deering, Warder, Bushnell & Glessner, and Plano Cos., in consideration of the transfer by each company of all its real estate, factories, plants, buildings, improvements, machinery, patterns, tools, apparatus, fixtures, patents, inventions, devices, patent rights, licenses, trade-marks, trade names, and good will, of all and singular said property as a going concern, and supplies, products, and materials on hand, pending contracts, railroad equipment, as well as all other property of the vendor appertaining to the vendor's business, except bills and accounts receivable."

Now, that is $53,400,000

Mr. JONES. Those are the allegations of the bill; they are not proved.

Senator REED (reading):

"Stock in the amount of $40,000,000 was apportioned among the owners of the McCormick, Deering, Plano, and Warder-Bushnell & Glessnor Cos., in consideration of the assignment by the vendor companies to the purchasing company of bills and accounts receivable of like amounts, guaranteed by the vendors or for cash.

"Stock in the amount of $3,148,196.66 was issued to J. P. Morgan & Co., of New York, who had paid that amount in cash to secure the property of the Milwaukee Harvester Co., which was conveyed to the International Harvester Co., as above stated."

Now, that was a company of $1,000,000.

"Stock in the amount of $3,451,863.34 was issued to J. P. Morgan & Co. for services rendered and for legal expenses."

That is the allegation of the bill, as you see; but generally speaking, the Government is pretty careful about this bill. However, I do not think we need waste any more time on that. I am through with my questions.

Senator SHAFROTH. None of this was, however, done while you were a director?

Mr. JONES. None of it.

Senator HOLLIS. I would like to ask a few questions: In 1909, Mr. Jones, you had to make up your mind whether you would become a director of the International Harvester Co.?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator HOLLIS. And you had to satisfy yourself upon certain problems. Now, you knew at that time that the International Harvester Co. was popularly called the Harvester Trust?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator HOLLIS. And you knew that throughout the West, or in some sections, there were charges that they acted as a monopoly, acted oppressively, and raised prices by unfair means. You knew those charges were made?

Mr. JONES. I did.

Senator HOLLIS. You did not want to become a director in a concern like that, did you?

Mr. JONES. No, sir.

Senator HOLLIS. And therefore you had to pass judgment for yourself as to whether those charges were true?

Mr. JONES. In a general way, I did.

Senator HOLLIS. Yes; in a general way.

Mr. JONES. I did.

Senator HOLLIS. Now, if you had believed that these other officials with whom you associated yourself were lawbreakers and were acting in violation of the Sherman antitrust law, would you have become a director?

Mr. JONES. No, sir; I would not if I thought so at the time.

Senator HOLLIS. At the time; I am speaking about 1909.

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator HOLLIS. And then the matters that you had to settle for yourself divided themselves into two branches, generally speaking.

The first was as to the original organization, which might or might not have been in violation of the Sherman antitrust law. Now, how did you regard that?

Mr. JONES. That is a legal question——

Senator HOLLIS (interposing). No; I am not asking you as to whether they had or not; but, as I understand, you regarded that as a question to be determined by the courts?

Mr. JONES. I did. I felt just as sure then as I do now that it would have to be decided by the courts.

Senator HOLLIS. And you considered that as a question on which honorable men might fairly divide?

Mr. JONES. I did.

Senator HOLLIS. The other question was as to the selling agencies throughout the country, where it was claimed that the International Harvester Co. in their contracts with dealers provided that the dealers should not deal in competing goods of any other concern. You knew that that was the charge?

Mr. JONES. I know that that was not the fact. It has been disproved.

Senator HOLLIS. I am asking you this: You knew that that was the charge?

Mr. JONES. I knew that that was the charge.

Senator HOLLIS. When you became associated with this company as a director, of course it would make a difference in the fairness or unfairness of the company whether that practice was continued?

Mr. JONES. It would.

Senator HOLLIS. And have you satisfied yourself as to whether the selling contracts are unfair?

Mr. JONES. I have satisfied myself that I believe they are entirely fair. There is no element of exclusive dealing in them at all. The agents of the International Harvester Co.'s machines handle the Deere machines; they handle any other machines that they see fit.

Senator HOLLIS. So that you, by personal investigation, have satisfied yourself that there is nothing in the conduct of the International Harvester Co. with which a high-minded man can not properly identify himself?

Mr. JONES. I have.

Senator HOLLIS. Now, going back to the 1909 situation, when you joined the company, was there any reason in the world why you should have associated yourself at that time with a company of lawbreakers?

Mr. JONES. Not the slightest.

Senator HOLLIS. Was there anything in it for you?

Mr. JONES. Nothing whatever in it, either financial or sentimental. I believed that the gentlemen who asked me to go in were not lawbreakers, and that is the reason I went in. If after I went in I had found out that they were, I would have gone out of the company.

Senator POMERENE. You did not anticipate this situation of to-day. [Laughter.]

Senator HOLLIS. If it should result, in the Government's suit against the International Harvester Co., that there is a decree that the combination was unlawful in 1901 or 1902, and that it must be dissolved, would that alter your opinion at all as to the moral status of your present associates?

Mr. JONES. It would not. That is a matter again upon which there might be a difference of opinion. I believe, personally, that they thought they were not doing anything wrong; but it may turn out that they were. If the court says that they were, we will all believe they were.

Senator HOLLIS. You distinguish, do you not, between something legally wrong and something morally wrong?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Senator REED. Do you think it is perfectly right morally for a man to create a monopoly?

Mr. JONES. That depends altogether upon the kind of monopoly. Business morality is in the making. Things that were considered legitimate 25 or 30 years ago are not considered legitimate now, and by the same persons.

Senator NELSON. Mr. Jones, you surprise me. I always thought the Decalogue and the principles of the Christian religion were immutable, and not subject to change. They are the same now as they were 1,800 years ago.

Mr. JONES. I am not speaking of the Decalogue.

Senator NELSON. But as to the rules and principles of morals I did not suppose there was any new discovery. You will recall that Macauley, in his History of England, says that while there are a great many new discoveries and inventions in science, in the matter of religion and morals there are none. But you have announced a new gospel.

Senator HOLLIS. Allow me to express what I understand as to the Gospel. That the principles of morals and of the Gospel have never changed, but our understanding of them has constantly changed.

Senator REED. I thought since the Sherman antitrust law was enacted we all understood that monopolies were prohibited and combinations in restraint of trade were made illegal. But I have no further questions to ask.

Senator LEE. If the criticisms of the law officers of the National Government, as expressed in this bill of complaint, should receive the final approval of the courts, no matter what form that approval might take, in the way of a decree, it would not have the slightest effect upon your personal fortunes?

Mr. JONES. Not a particle. I have got $100 invested in the common stock; that is all.

Senator LEE. Now, in case those criticisms should take affirmative form, in the nature of a final decree, and this company was directed to do certain things, or undo certain things which were done, your attitude would be, of course, entirely corresponding to the order of the court?

Mr. JONES. Why, certainly.

Senator LEE. There is nothing in your financial or personal relationship that would preclude you from taking that attitude?

Mr. JONES. Nothing at all, Senator.

Senator LEE. You have been acquainted a long time with the President, have you not, Mr. Jones? You have been closely associated with him in Princeton matters?

Mr. JONES. Yes; Princeton University.

Senator LEE. And in that connection he has had ample opportunity to make personal observation of your character and conduct, has he not?

Mr. JONES. He has had some opportunity to make investigation; yes, sir.

Senator REED. It is an unpleasant question to ask, and I only ask it to show that there is a distinction. You say that no decree of the court would affect your personal fortune. If it should be determined by the court that the harvester company is a trust operating in violation of law——

Senator HOLLIS (interposing). I referred to this bill of injunction.

Senator REED (continuing). It might affect the officers of the company.

Mr. JONES. Why, there is nothing charged against them. I do not understand how there could be a personal decree there, Senator. There has never been any suggestion of a thing of that sort that I have heard.

Senator REED. It is a very possible form of decree, however.

Senator HOLLIS. I want to remind the members of the committee that they have not asked anything about the Zinc Trust.

Senator HITCHCOCK. That will come up later.

(Thereupon, at 3 o'clock p. m., the committee took a recess on a call for a quorum in the Senate, after which the following proceedings were had:)

Senator NELSON. Mr. Jones, are you a stockholder, director, and officer in the New Jersey Zinc Co.?

Mr. JONES. I am a stockholder and a director. I am not an officer.

Senator NELSON. Did you join in the organization of that company?

Mr. JONES. I did not join in the organization of the company; that had been organized a long time ago. I joined in the acquisition by the New Jersey Zinc Co. of the Mineral Point Zinc Co. in 1897.

Senator NELSON. I am coming to that.

Mr. JONES. Yes; I had nothing to do with the New Jersey Zinc Co.; that was organized a long time ago.

Senator NELSON. You are a stockholder and a director in the Mineral Point Zinc Co.?

Mr. JONES. I am a director and I am at present its president.

Senator NELSON. Yes.

Mr. JONES. The Mineral Point Zinc Co. is a subsidiary of the New Jersey Zinc Co.

Senator NELSON. When was that Mineral Point Zinc Co. organized?

Mr. JONES. The Mineral Point Zinc Co. was organized in 1883.
Senator NELSON. And when was it taken in by the New Jersey Zinc Co.?
Mr. JONES. In 1897
Senator NELSON. 1897. After it was taken in, was there an increase in the capitalization of the New Jersey Co.?
Mr. JONES. Yes sir.
Senator NELSON. What was the capitalization before that?
Mr. JONES. The capitalization before that was something like $4,000,000.
Senator NELSON. $4,000,000?
Mr. JONES. The capital stock was increased in 1897 to $10,000,000.
Senator NELSON. $10,000,000. And how much was your Mineral Point Zinc Co. taken in at?
Mr. JONES. About $900,000.
Senator NELSON. What was the original capitalization of that company?
Mr. JONES. $400,000.
Senator NELSON. And they took you into the New Jersey Co. at $900,000?
Mr. JONES. They did. That was the capitalization.
Senator NELSON. Did you get money or stock for it?
Mr. JONES. Stock entirely; no money.
Senator NELSON. The New Jersey Co., you say, is capitalized for $10,000,000?
Mr. JONES. $10,000,000.
Senator NELSON. What does that consist of, common and preferred stock?
Mr. JONES. No, sir; it is all one stock; there is no preferred stock; it is common stock.
Senator NELSON. One stock?
Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.
Senator NELSON. Is the company bonded, too?
Mr. JONES. Yes, sir; it has a bond issue of $4,000,000, of which there is a little under $3,000,000 outstanding.
Senator NELSON. $3,000,000. That is in addition to the capital stock?
Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.
Senator NELSON. Did you become a director of the New Jersey Co. at the time they took in your Mineral Point Co.?
Mr. JONES. No, sir.
Senator NELSON. When did you become a director of the New Jersey Co.?
Mr. JONES. I became a director of the New Jersey Zinc Co. about six years ago, I should say.
Senator NELSON. Are you acquainted with what is known as the Prime Western Smelter Co.?
Mr. JONES. I am.
Senator NELSON. What is that—a Wisconsin corporation?
Mr. JONES. No, sir; a Missouri corporation.
Senator NELSON. Were you one of the organizers of that company?
Mr. JONES. No, sir; I had nothing to do with the organization of it.
Senator NELSON. Are you a stockholder?
Mr. JONES. That is a subsidiary of the New Jersey Co.
Senator NELSON. I asked you, are you a stockholder in that?
Mr. JONES. I am not.
Senator NELSON. Are you a director?
Mr. JONES. I am not.
Senator NELSON. Is it a subsidiary of the New Jersey Co.?
Mr. JONES. It is.
Senator NELSON. Do you know what that was taken in for?
Mr. JONES. I can not tell you exactly. I should say roughly about $300,000, but I am not sure about it.
Senator NELSON. Do you know what it was capitalized for originally?
Mr. JONES. I do not know; I do not remember.
Senator NELSON. But it was taken in by the New Jersey Co.?
Mr. JONES. It was.
Senator NELSON. For $300,000?
Mr. JONES. I should say about that. I do not carry the figures in my mind accurately.
Senator NELSON. Do you know anything about the Empire Zinc Co.?
Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.
Senator NELSON. What kind of corporation is it?
Mr. JONES. That is a mining organization entirely; it furnishes the raw material; it mines zinc ore; it does not manufacture at all.
Senator NELSON. What State is that corporation organized under?
Mr. JONES That is a Missouri corporation, I think; Missouri or Colorado; Missouri, I think.
Senator NELSON. How much is that capitalized for?
Mr. JONES. I am not sure; I do not remember about that; it is not a large corporation.
Senator NELSON. Was that taken in by the New Jersey Zinc Co.?
Mr. JONES. It was.
Senator NELSON. Are you president and director of the Depew & Northern Railway Co.?
Mr. JONES. I am.
Senator NELSON. Where is that?
Mr. JONES. That is a road about 4 miles long, connecting the smelter plant of the Mineral Point Zinc Co. at Depew, Ill., with what was known as the "3 I's Railway Co." It is a connecting road.
Senator NELSON. Was that taken in by the New Jersey Co.?
Mr. JONES. The stock of that is owned by the Mineral Point Zinc Co., which is a subsidiary.
Senator NELSON. The stock is owned by the Mineral Point Zinc Co., which is a subsidiary of the New Jersey Co.?
Mr. JONES. Yes, sir; it was a feeding road of the Mineral Point Co. plant.
Senator NELSON. Are you connected with the Mineral Point & Northern Railroad Co.?
Mr. JONES. I am a director of that.
Senator NELSON. Is that a Wisconsin corporation?
Mr. JONES. That is a Wisconsin corporation. That is also a feeding road, all the stock of which is owned by the Mineral Point Zinc Co. It is intended to connect the plant of the Mineral Point Zinc Co. with the iron-ore territory.
Senator NELSON. So that the Mineral Point Zinc Co. owns these two railroad companies, and the Mineral Point Zinc Co. was taken in by the New Jersey Co.?
Mr. JONES. These railroads were built after it was taken in.
Senator NELSON. Yes; but the stock is held by this Mineral Point Zinc Co.?
Mr. JONES. It is.
Senator NELSON. And the Mineral Point Co. stock is held by the New Jersey Co.?
Mr. JONES. It is.
Senator NELSON. Have you any competitors in the zinc business of any account—the New Jersey corporation?
Mr. JONES. Yes, sir; very vigorous competitors.
Senator NELSON. Your chief mine is in New Jersey, is it not?
Mr. JONES. Yes; the chief mine is in New Jersey.
Senator NELSON. Yes. Does not the company have a zinc-proof contract with their customers? Does not the company make a contract with their customers regulating the sale and disposal of the property?
Mr. JONES. No, sir; it does not.
Senator NELSON. No kind of contract?
Mr. JONES. No, sir.
Senator NELSON. Just a sales contract?
Mr. JONES. They are at liberty to do anything they like with it after they get it.
Senator NELSON. What are the profits of the New Jersey Co. a year?
Mr. JONES. The last two years the profits have been large, growing out of its mining operations. The profits were about $5,000,000.
Senator NELSON. $5,000,000?
Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.
Senator NELSON. And they paid a dividend of about how much?
Mr. JONES. They paid dividends of about $5,000,000 during the last year and $4,000,000 the year before.
Senator HITCHCOCK. What was the capital?
Mr. JONES. $10,000,000.
Senator NELSON. They paid $5,000,000 this year and $4,000,000 the year before?
Mr. JONES. That is my recollection; yes, sir.
Senator NELSON. And what interest do the bonds bear?
Mr. JONES. Four per cent.
Senator NELSON. That is, after paying the fixed charges and paying the interest on the bonds they had this dividend to pay?
Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.
Senator NELSON. Fifty per cent one year and over 40 per cent the next year?
Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.
Senator NELSON. It is a profitable thing?
Mr. JONES. That, you will bear in mind, is largely a mining enterprise, and the dividends are not, strictly speaking, profits. A mining corporation distributes its assets with each dividend. In other words, a mining corporation stands on a little different basis from other corporations.
Senator NELSON. You export your ore, do you not?
Mr. JONES. Only a small portion of ores that can not be used here. It is a special product of ore.
Senator NELSON. Do you not sell mostly by mail to paint grinders?
Mr. JONES. By mail?
Senator NELSON. Yes.
Mr. JONES. None at all.
Senator NELSON. Who are the customers of the New Jersey Co.?
Mr. JONES. We make three products—oxide of zinc, spelter, and sulphuric acid, which is a by-product of the ores.
Senator NELSON. Whom do you sell that stuff to?
Mr. JONES. The oxide of zinc is sold in about equal quantities to paint grinders and to rubber manufacturers.
Senator NELSON Yes.
Mr JONES. It is used very largely in the manufacture of rubber—in whitening rubber.
Senator NELSON. Do you sell it to jobbers or retailers?
Mr. JONES. We sell it to retailers.
Senator NELSON. Throughout the country?
Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.
Senator NELSON. Do you have any contract of rebate with them, or any contract by which you fix the price at which to sell your product?
Mr. JONES. None whatever.
Senator NELSON. And what do you do with the other products?
Mr. JONES. Spelter we sell to the trade at large.
Senator NELSON. Yes.
Mr. JONES. Also the sulphuric acid.
Senator NELSON. To the jobbers or the retailers?
Mr. JONES. The retailers. We do not sell to jobbers at all.
Senator NELSON. You do not sell to jobbers?
Mr. JONES. No, sir.
Senator NELSON. Now, you say last year your profits in the company—you declared a dividend of $5,000,000, which would be fully 50 per cent; and the year before over $4,000,000. Now, how much the year before that?
Mr. JONES. Well, it went down; the year before that, my recollection is that the profits would be about $3,500,000; but the figures are not——
Senator NELSON (interposing). Now, the company was organized in 1907?
Mr. JONES. No, sir; in 1897.
Senator NELSON. I mean your company was taken in then?
Mr. JONES. In 1897.
Senator NELSON. In 1897 your company, the Mineral Paint Co., was taken in?
Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.
Senator NELSON. And shortly after that you were elected a director, were you not?
Mr. JONES. No, sir; I was elected a director about six years ago.
Senator NELSON. What have been the profits; take the six years, year by year, the first years that you were a director?
Mr. JONES. During the first years they were comparatively low.
Senator NELSON. How low? Enough to pay 10 per cent dividends?
Mr. JONES. No, sir; not during the first years.
Senator NELSON. Seven per cent?
Mr. JONES. I should say about 7 per cent.
Senator NELSON. Well, the next year?
Mr. JONES. Well, with the improved mining plants that we had they gradually went up. The dividends have been increasing.
Senator NELSON. How much were they the next year?
Mr. JONES. Well, in a period of 17 years I do not remember the dividends right along from year to year. They went up to 10 per cent.
Senator NELSON. Thirty per cent, 40 per cent, or 50 per cent?
Mr. JONES. It did not reach 30 per cent until, I should say, three or four years ago.
Senator NELSON. And since then have they been at that rate, from 40 to 50 per cent?
Mr. JONES. During the last two years; yes, sir.
Senator NELSON. About 50 per cent?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.
Senator NELSON. A pretty good stock. I guess that is all.
Senator REED. How many companies have been taken into that New Jersey company, absorbed or financed in any way?
Mr. JONES. Two besides ours.
Senator REED. What proportion of zinc products does that New Jersey company control?
Mr. JONES. Zinc products?
Senator REED. Of the products that you produce?
Mr. JONES. In the spelter business—that is metallic zinc—the total spelter trade of the country amounts to about $375,000 to $400,000, of which the New Jersey Zinc Co. and its subsidiaries manufacture about 20 per cent. Of the sulphuric acid, which is a by-product in roasting the zinc ore, the total output of the country is enormous. The total output of the country is fully 3,000,000 of tons, of which we make 100,000.
Senator SHAFROTH. One-thirtieth then you make?
Mr. JONES. Three per cent of the total output.
Senator SHAFROTH. That would be about one-thirtieth?
Mr. JONES. Yes; of zinc, the New Jersey Zinc Co. and its subsidiary, the Mineral Point Zinc Co., make about 70,000 to 75,000 tons a year, and make the larger part of the product of the country. That is made out of the New Jersey zinc mine ores, which are the only ores in the country that make a certain grade of oxide of zinc.
Senator NELSON. The oxide of zinc; is that the material from which they make paint?
Senator REED. White lead?
Mr. JONES. No; not white lead. White lead is an entirely different product. Of course it is keenly competitive with zinc in paints. Mixed paints are made up of a certain percentage of it.
Senator REED. It looks like white lead; is that it?
Mr. JONES. Yes, sir; it has certain advantages over white lead. It does not turn yellow, for instance, while white lead does turn yellow.
Senator REED. You said you made the large part of the product. What proportion?
Mr. JONES. The Sherwin-Williams Co. has quite a large plant down in Missouri; just the output of that I do not know. The Ozark Co.—I think they make about 10,000 tons. The Mineral Point Zinc Co. makes about 7,000 tons, and the New Jersey Co., at Mine Hill., makes about 65,000 tons.
Senator REED. Are those the only concerns that produce the product?
Mr. JONES. They are the principal concerns that produce the product.
Senator REED. Then you produce about 70 per cent?
Mr. JONES. Of the oxide of zinc; yes.
Senator REED. Now, where in Missouri are your mines located?
Mr. JONES. We have no mines of consequence in Missouri. We have mines in Colorado. We have some mines in Joplin, Mo., but we are not operating them.
Senator REED. I understood you to say you had some in Missouri. You simply have some mine territory there?
Mr. JONES. Yes. We have some ore properties in Colorado, at Canon City, Colo., and we have bought considerable ores at Leadville.
Senator REED. As I understand you, this oxide of zinc is used to make a paint, which is a character of paint which closely resembles white lead, and then it can be colored to any color?
Mr. JONES. Zinc oxide is never used by itself as a paint. It is used in combination with lead. It lacks what is called coloring capacity when used alone.
Senator REED. Has the New Jersey concern any relations of any kind with any other institution engaged in producing this product?
Mr. JONES. None whatever; only the subsidiaries that I have mentioned.
Senator REED. You sell in competition then with them?
Mr. JONES. Absolutely.
Senator HITCHCOCK. And in the case of oxide of zinc you manufacture about 90 per cent of the product?
Mr. JONES. Not more than about 85 per cent. I am not sure what the Sherwin-Williams Co. manufacture. They are the largest manufacturers of mixed paint. They use a great deal themselves, and just how much they sell I do not know.
Senator REED. You are making that oxide of zinc in Wisconsin, in your plant there, and the New Jersey company in its plant in New Jersey?
Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.
Senator REED. And what other company was there making it that was taken in?
Mr. JONES. What was known as Manning & Squire. There were two concerns that claimed an interest in this large mine in New Jersey, the unique mine deposit—Manning & Squire and the Lehigh Zinc & Iron Co. They were all mining portions of the same mine, and there had been litigation among them lasting for pretty nearly 40 years as to lines, etc., and the courts were at their wits' ends how to decide it, and the New Jersey company purchased the interest of those companies in that mine.
Senator REED. The New Jersey Zinc Co. was a company that was organized to take over all of these properties and adjust these differences by accommodation?
Mr. JONES. No, sir; that is not correct. The New Jersey company is an old company organized 40 years ago.
Senator REED. It was finally used as a conduit to take them over, however?
Mr. JONES. It purchased the other companies.
Senator REED. And it paid them in stock?
Mr. JONES. It paid them in stock.
Senator REED. So that in that way the New Jersey company, which was an old company which had a limited capital stock, acquired the properties. Do you remember how much its capital stock was before this consolidation?
Mr. JONES. I should say about $4,000,000.
Senator REED. And it proceeded then to increase its capital stock and to take in these various rivals that were quarreling over the ownership of that deposit in New Jersey and pay them out of the common stock?
Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.
Senator REED. Thus all those rivalries were reconciled?
Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.
Senator REED. Those concerns that you speak of as being engaged in mining are also engaged in manufacturing?
Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.
Senator REED. So that the mining controversies were wiped out and the rivalries in trade between those concerns were wiped out?
Mr. JONES. That is correct.
Senator REED. Now, that left your company one of the large outside producers?
Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.
Senator REED. And your company was taken in, and you took your pay in stock?
Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.
Senator REED. And thus there was put into this one consolidation 80 per cent to 90 per cent of the production of zinc oxide?
Mr. JONES. Yes; not of spelter.
Senator REED. Of zinc oxide?
Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.
Senator REED. So that the only important concern left outside is the Sherwin-Williams Co., of Missouri?
Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.
Senator HITCHCOCK. It has about one-eighth?
Senator REED. Yes. Now, all of this consolidation of these various interests was worked out through increasing the capital stock of the New Jersey company and turning over to the various companies that were taken in or to their owners stock in the new company?
Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.
Senator HITCHCOCK. What is the price of zinc now?
Mr. JONES. It varies according to the quality a good deal. Oxide of zinc which contains a little lead, which practically all western oxide does, sells about half a cent lower than oxide of zinc which is made at the New Jersey mine, which is practically lead free. It ranges anywhere from 4½ cents up to 5¼ cents.
Senator HITCHCOCK. It has been advancing in price over a period of years?
Mr. JONES. There was an advance made about two years ago. There was no advance made this year.
Senator HITCHCOCK. How has it been affected by this last tariff?
Mr. JONES. The tariff was reduced on oxide of zinc and spelter.
Senator HITCHCOCK. Has it affected the price?
Mr. JONES. It has not affected the sale very materially.
Senator HITCHCOCK. Are there any importations of oxide of zinc?
Mr. JONES. There are importations of what is known as French oxide, red seal and green seal. The French processes of manufacture are entirely different from the American. First, they make spelter, the metallic zinc, and then they oxidize that, and it makes a denser, whiter pigment that costs a good deal more money. That is worth from 6 to 7 cents a pound, and there is an importation of that.
Senator HITCHCOCK. Is this oxide of zinc used in stereotyping?
Mr. JONES. No, sir. Spelter, the metallic zinc, is used in zinc plates.
Senator HITCHCOCK. I know that the cost of stereotyping material has been increasing.
Mr. JONES. No; oxide of zinc is not used for that.
Senator REED. There is no real competition between the character of oxide of zinc you produce and the character of oxide of zinc produced in Europe. That is correct, is it not—that is a higher grade?
Mr. JONES. That is a higher grade of oxide. Of course, there is competition for the reason that the denser, whiter pigment will go farther than oxide made by the American process.
Senator CRAWFORD. Do this New Jersey company and the Sherwin-Williams Co. in this country control this oxide production?
Mr. JONES. Yes, sir. The Sherwin-Williams Co. and the New Jersey company control the oxide production. Its subsidiaries manufacture all the oxide of zinc that there is of American manufacture.
Senator CRAWFORD. They do not control the basic material from which the oxide can be produced in this country?
Mr. JONES. Not all, except so far as the ores of Mine Hill are peculiar; they are lead free. Oxide of zinc that is produced from western ores has an ingredient of lead which makes it impracticable to use it in the rubber trade. It makes the rubber brittle.
Senator CRAWFORD. Does that explain why they have such a large proportion of this business?
Mr. JONES. Absolutely. The Mine Hill ore has had a natural monopoly of ores of that character. There is no other mine of the kind in the world.
Senator HITCHCOCK. That is in New Jersey, is it not?
Mr. JONES. That is in New Jersey.
Senator REED. Why were your profits so comparatively small formerly?
Mr. JONES. In the first place the properties were very uneconomically managed. That is a very expensive mine; you have to go down deep for the ore; and the mining expense has been greatly reduced and the output has been increased. As I said before, all mining operations are necessarily exhaustive proceedings, and that mine is an extraordinary mine, but it is a rapidly exhausting mine. The company has been making the utmost out of it, and every economy that can be made has been used, and gradually it will be compelled to find some means of utilizing western ores, which at present are utilized to a limited extent.
Senator REED. You spoke a moment ago about that mine being a natural monopoly. What was your mine in Wisconsin?
Mr. JONES. What was our mine in Wisconsin?
Senator REED. Your mine in Wisconsin produced the same class, did it not?
Mr. JONES. No, sir; it did not. That was the trouble. The Mineral Point Zinc Co. was organized by a number of citizens of Mineral Point, Wis., who developed the zinc business and the territory—I was born there, and born with an interest in it. And when these citizens of Mineral Point built an oxide plant there they knew nothing about it. They borrowed a lot of money from a brother of mine, and when they found that they had the plant all fixed and all built and had their storehouse full, they could not sell a pound of it; and the way we got into the zinc business was, we had to take that property, at their urgent solicitation, for the money that my brother had loaned to them.
At that time there was a certain amount of what is known as carbonates. The zinc ores are mostly carbonate and silicate and sulphide ores.
Of the carbonate ores there was a sufficient supply for our purposes. We had to tear down the plants and rebuild them, and of the carbonate ores—there were a sufficient amount of carbonate ores for our uses for the time being, but that stock became exhausted; and there is to-day—outside of a certain amount of carbonate ores at Leadville, there is not much deposit of carbonate ores there.
At that time it was impossible to make oxide of zinc that was salable out of the desulphurized sulphide, and we found that the kind of oxide that we could make out of the ores that were left in Wisconsin would only meet certain demands of the paint men; that is, certain grades of paint only, and not the others. We were at a disadvantage, in that the kind of ores that we were restricted to would not make the kind of oxide of zinc that the trade demanded; and this New Jersey deposit, which was, as I say, practically a natural monopoly of a nonleaded zinc—they could supply the entire trade.

On the other hand, the New Jersey Zinc Co.'s mine was rapidly exhausting, and the time was certain to arrive when they would have to make oxide of zinc of some sort out of western ores. In other words, they would have to establish a western department in order to meet the requirements of the trade after that mine was exhausted; and our needs, with what was certain to be their need, dictated an industrial fixing up of the business with them. It was not a question of monopolization; it was a question of "root hog or die."

Senator REED. I do not understand how, if you did not have the material, you could be of benefit to them.

Mr. JONES. Because we were making a low grade of oxide which was valuable used with——

Senator REED (interposing). Mixed with theirs?

Mr. JONES. Mixed with theirs. And we do mix it to this day.

Senator REED. By mixing the two products——

Mr. JONES (interposing). By mixing the two products we made a salable product.

Senator HITCHCOCK. You were not making any dividends before you consolidated with the New Jersey company?

Mr. JONES. The Mineral Point Co. never at that time had paid a dollar of dividends. I do not mean to say that we did not make any money, but every dollar of the money had to go into plant, experiments, and extensions.

Senator CRAWFORD. Then these big dividends will come to an end when this New Jersey mine is exhausted?

Mr. JONES. I am sorry to say they will.

Senator CRAWFORD. Then you are making hay while the sun shines?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator CRAWFORD. You have got a pretty good thing while it lasts?

Senator HITCHCOCK. You were taken into that concern in what year?

Mr. JONES. Eighteen hundred and ninety-seven. And I say that there has never, to my knowledge, been a charge of any sort that we have been in violation of any Federal law, and no charge in any State in which we have operated that we have been in violation of any State law at all.

Senator HITCHCOCK. That was in 1897. Prior to that time your capital stock had been about $400,000?

Mr. JONES. $400,000.

Senator HITCHCOCK. And you were given $900,000 of stock in the New Jersey concern, and the New Jersey concern had $4,000,000, which was increased to $10,000,000?

Mr. JONES. $10,000,000.

Senator HITCHCOCK. With an indebtedness of $3,000,000?

Mr. JONES. The indebtedness was incurred afterwards, to build plants. There was no indebtedness in 1897.

Senator HITCHCOCK. So that the capital of the two concerns was doubled at the time of the consolidation?

Mr. JONES. Substantially; yes, sir.

Senator SHAFROTH. What was the value of your plant at the time it was taken into the New Jersey company?

Mr. JONES. We had a mine down in New Mexico, which we still have, which is a pretty good mine, and I should say that when we turned in our company the value of our properties was fully what we got in stock at the time.

Senator SHAFROTH. $900,000?

Mr. JONES. $900,000. I should say that the plant was worth at least $450,000, the capital stock being $400,000, and that our mine was worth as much more.

Senator SHAFROTH. What was the New Jersey company worth? How much did it put in in actual value into this new organization?

Mr. JONES. Well, it put this mine, on which no valuation has ever been put.

Senator SHAFROTH. It is very valuable, however?

Mr. JONES. Oh, yes; it is still a valuable property, although, as I say, it is a rapidly exhausting property.

Senator SHAFROTH. I will ask you whether or not, in your judgment, the total assets and property of the company amounted to $10,000,000?

Mr. JONES. I think they did; yes, sir.

Senator SHAFROTH. So that you do not think that any watered stock was put into either one of them?

Mr. JONES. No, sir; not a dollar.

Senator HITCHCOCK. Are there any further questions?

Senator REED. Had the mine in New Mexico ever paid any dividends?

Mr. JONES. No, sir. Well, that belongs to the Empire Co.; it has made no profit.

Senator REED. I say, at the time it went in?

Mr JONES. No, sir; we had gotten ores from it. We had not developed the mine at the time we sold it to the New Jersey Zinc Co.

Senator REED. Has it been developed since?

Mr. JONES. It is being developed now.

Senator REED. Do you get some of this ore out of it that you use in mixing the oxide?

Mr. JONES. Some of it. We got it for that purpose, but it proved not so very good. But large bodies of sulphide——

Senator NELSON (interposing). Your company was taken in by the New Jersey company for $900,000, and that Missouri company, I think you said, for $300,000?

Mr. JONES. The Prime Western, that was purchased afterwards. That was not a part of the original transaction. We wanted to go into western spelter.

Senator NELSON. What was taken in when they organized the New Jersey company and issued all that stock? What was taken in outside of the original company?

Mr. JONES. The organization known as the Lehigh Zinc & Iron Co. and a concern known as Manning & Squire, of New York.

Senator NELSON. They were taken in at how much?

Mr. JONES. I do not remember the amount. They were taken in. I think Manning & Squire was taken in at about, I should say, $1,200,000. It has been so long ago I do not remember the exact figures, but I should say the Lehigh Zinc & Iron Co. was taken in at about $1,500,000.

Senator NELSON. Now, this old New Jersey company owned this mine, did they not?

Mr. JONES. It had been in litigation for 40 years between these three concerns. They claimed to own it all, and the others claimed to own a large slice of it.

Senator NELSON. And they settled the litigation and issued stock?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. I am going to ask a question, but I suppose it shows my ignorance. What is spelter?

Mr. JONES. Spelter is metallic zinc.

Senator NELSON. Metallic zinc?

Mr. JONES. It is like sheet zinc.

Senator NELSON. What is that used for?

Mr. JONES. It is used in galvanizing. All the galvanizing is made out of spelter, and all the sheet zinc. It is used in the arts pretty largely. And it is used in making brass very largely. It is one of the constituents of brass.

Senator NELSON. What proportion of the spelter products of the country does the New Jersey company produce?

Mr. JONES. A little less than 20 per cent.

Senator NELSON. And 90 per cent of the oxide?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. There is another product?

Mr. JONES. Sulphuric acid.

Senator NELSON. What proportion of that does the new Jersey company produce?

Mr. JONES. About 3 per cent.

Senator NELSON. And what is that used for?

Mr. JONES. Sulphuric acid?

Senator NELSON. Yes.

Mr. JONES. It is used very largely in making fertilizers and in the arts. It is used in the Southern States in manufacturing fertilizers; the bulk of it is used for that. That is an enormous industry. We make that merely as a by-product of the roasted ores. Most of it is made out of iron pyrites, as a direct manufacture. We do not do that at all.

Senator NELSON. Now, what is the process when you extract the ores from the New Jersey mines in the ground? Do you reduce it first?

Mr. JONES. No, sir. That is a complex ore. It consists of what is known as willamite—that is, a silicate of zinc and a mixture of willamite and franklinite, which is a mixture of manganese and iron zinc. That is separated by quite an elaborate magnetic separating plant, a very large plant, which, by magnetic process, takes the franklinite, which is slightly magnetic, out of the willamite, and that willamite is then used in making spelter, being free from iron and lead; the franklinite is roasted in furnaces, and the oxide of zinc goes away and the franklinite—the iron—remains as what is known as speigeleisen, which is then used in making steel. It is fed into steel furnaces and it helps to make the steel tough.

Senator CRAWFORD. Do you employ many men in your New Jersey corporation?

Mr. JONES. Employees?

Senator CRAWFORD. Yes.

Mr. JONES. Yes; a very large number. Of course, the mining operations nowadays are carried on largely by machinery, but we employ a very considerable number of men in mining and also in the smelting industry.

Senator CRAWFORD. Smelting and manufacturing?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator CRAWFORD. Are you in sympathy with the general policy of these big consolidations, with the power that may be, in the abstract, dangerous, depending entirely on whether the men who are using it are good men or bad men?

Mr. JONES. No, sir; I am not in sympathy with them.

Senator CRAWFORD. You really do not believe in it?

Mr. JONES. I do not, frankly. I am giving my personal impressions now, and not those of any corporations I may be connected with. I think industrially most of them are failures, and the difficulty is that they reduce the individual to a mere unit.

Senator CRAWFORD. Your idea is that if one of them is organized it may be dangerous or it may be kept within bounds by the right kind of a board of directors; that you could accept a position on the board of directors for the purpose of keeping it within bounds, although there was a dangerous power vested in it?

Mr. JONES. I think they can be kept within reasonable bounds perfectly well, and I think many of them are.

Senator HITCHCOCK. You think this is not a combination in restraint of trade or in control of trade—the New Jersey Zinc Co.?

Mr. JONES. I do not.

Senator HITCHCOCK. It has 85 per cent, you say, of the zinc trade of the country?

Mr. JONES. Of the oxide of zinc.

Senator HITCHCOCK. Of the oxide of zinc, I mean; yes.

Mr. JONES. About that.

Senator HITCHCOCK. Well, is there any other concern that controls a larger per cent of the products it manufactures?

Mr. JONES. Not of oxide of zinc.

Senator HITCHCOCK. No; I mean of any other industry. Is there any other company that comes any nearer to monopolizing a certain product?

Mr. JONES. No, sir. As I said, so long as oxide of zinc continues to be made out of the New Jersey mine ores the trade demands it and will not have anything else. It makes a grade of oxide zinc that can not be made out of any other known ores in this country. I will say frankly that that mine is the whole business. There is no artificial combination of units to eliminate competition. That has not been attempted at all, and has not been accomplished; but that mine constitutes a natural monopoly

Senator HITCHCOCK. Suppose your company and these others had not been united with the New Jersey corporation, would there be some competition between them?

Mr. JONES. Well, as I told you before, we were up against it, because we could not get ores that would make a product that would meet all the needs of our customers; and it was in order to get a product that would meet the needs of our customers that we were willing—we had not any desire, but we were willing—to sell our properties to the New Jersey company for stock in that company; and ever since then, as I told you, we have mixed the two and made a good product out of the mixture. I believe it has been industrially a great advantage to our customers; and my own judgment is that our customers have been fairly treated, and as you have seen there has been no combination in restraint of trade.

Senator HITCHCOCK. One of the purposes in creating the new banking and currency system is to decentralize the banking power in the United States.

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator HITCHCOCK. Which has been used to create monopolies. And I suppose that thought has been in the minds of some when the question arose as to your connection with two concerns which seem to have for their purpose a creation of great combinations; and the committee was curious to know whether your views were in harmony with the opinion of the country, which is strongly opposed to anything tending to centralize or monopolize business.

Mr. JONES. I have not the slightest hesitation in answering any questions along that line that may be asked as to what my views may be as to general policy. I am thoroughly in accord with what I believe to be President Wilson's policy in destroying monopoly.

Senator HITCHCOCK. How would you go to work in destroying the zinc monopoly?

Mr. JONES. I do not believe it is destructive, because I do not believe it is a monopoly in that sense.

Senator CRAWFORD. That is a case where the supply has been limited by nature and is not limited by artificial combination.

Mr. JONES. Exactly.

Senator HITCHCOCK. Yes; it looks that way.

Senator SHAFROTH. There is no law requiring a man who owns a mine, if there is no other mine of the kind in the world, to divide it up so as to permit of competition.

Senator CRAWFORD. By destroying the combination you could not increase the output from that mine.

Senator HITCHCOCK. Where are the other mines in the world that produce oxide of zinc?

Mr. JONES. The European oxide of zinc is made, as I said, out of spelter. They do not make it out of ores direct. The Vielle Montagne is the original concern and is still very wealthy.

Senator HITCHCOCK. Where is that?

Mr. JONES. The Vielle Montagne is a Belgian concern. They are the central, the head of all the zinc concerns, and they buy mostly their ores. They have ores of their own. The Vielle Montagne was originally a mine, but that was exhausted, as most mines are exhausted, and they buy their ores all over the world. They get a good deal from Spain. They get a good deal from Silesia. There are large zinc mines in Silesia, and there is a Turco-Greek island that produces a good deal.

Senator HITCHCOCK. What is our tariff on your product?

Mr. JONES. The tariff on spelter was reduced to 1½ cents. It was 2½ cents; and the tariff on oxide of zinc, I think, is the same—1½ cents or 1¾ cents.

Senator HITCHCOCK. It is a reduction from what it formerly was?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator HITCHCOCK. Why should there be any tariff if there is only one mine in the country?

Mr. JONES. You take the Sherwin-Williams Co., out in Missouri. They would have something to say about it. They are buying Missouri and New Mexico ores. As far as the New Jersey Zinc Co. is concerned, the probability is that the foreign products would not seriously jeopardize its business, so long as it has this one mine which is going.

Senator HITCHCOCK. Suppose the tariff is 1½ cents per pound, what per cent of your selling price would that represent?

Mr. JONES. Well, taking 4¾ cents, for instance, about the selling price—30 per cent. It is not so much a question of the tariff on zinc as it is the relative tariff on white lead and zinc. They are the real competitors, and they are very vigorous competitors.

When you say that we have 85 per cent of the oxide of zinc trade, that is misleading, because the real competitor of zinc is white lead, and every movement in either one of those products affects the other, and there is a very keen and lively competition, and always has been, between white lead and zinc.

Senator HITCHCOCK. Are there any other questions? We have kept Mr. Jones nearly all day.

Senator LEE. Senator CRAWFORD has just called your attention to the fact that nothing could be done to increase the product of that New Jersey mine, and yet the combination that you have made really increased the applicability and public usefulness of the product of that mine, did it not?

Mr. JONES. Oh, yes; it has made the output a great deal more, although, of course, that hastens the exhaustion.

Senator SHAFROTH. You were speaking of the competition between white lead and zinc?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Senator SHAFROTH. Now, what is the extent of the production of white lead?

Mr. JONES. Oh, it is very large; very much larger than that of oxide of zinc. I could not give you the figures.

Senator SHAFROTH. And yet that has a very strong influence upon the price of zinc?

Mr. JONES. It has the controlling influence. I should say there is probably three or four times as much white lead used as there is oxide of zinc.

Senator SHAFROTH. I have no other questions, Mr. Chairman.

Senator HITCHCOCK. Are there any further questions by any member of the committee? Mr. Jones, we are very much obliged for your statement.

Mr. JONES. I am obliged to you and the committee for your courtesy, Mr. Chairman.

(Thereupon, at 4 o'clock p. m., the committee adjourned.)

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I move that on Saturday next, immediately after the close of the morning hour, the Senate proceed to the consideration of the trade commission bill, and that at not later than 4 o'clock on that day a vote be taken on the bill and all pending amendments.

Mr. SMOOT. The motion is out of order, Mr. President. The Senator can not now move to take up a bill at some future day. He can ask unanimous consent to take it up.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. He can not create a cloture by motion.

Mr. SMOOT. It is impossible to create a cloture on a bill by moving to take it up on a certain day. The Senator can ask unanimous consent.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then I ask unanimous consent that——

Mr. SMOOT. In order to do that the roll will have to be called, and I ask the Senator not to make the request, because, until the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] returns, I shall not give consent to a vote upon this bill at any time.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask the Senator whether Senators on the other side have not received a communication from the Senator from Iowa saying that he will be back on Friday and will be perfectly willing to proceed to a vote on this bill on Saturday? He told me that he would acquaint his friends on the other side with his views in that particular.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly aware that the Senator from Iowa will be back on Friday. That is what he stated before he left here; but nothing was said, nor have I heard anything from the Senator from Iowa, as to an agreement for unanimous consent to vote on the bill. Further, I wish to say to the Senator from Nevada that there are one or two other Senators who will not consent to a unanimous-consent agreement at this time. I have been asked by a Senator within 10 minutes to allow no unanimous-consent agreement at this time, and we are only losing time by requests for unanimous consent to vote upon this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege. Almost coincident with the passage on my motion by this body of Senate resolution No. 153, directing the Interstate Commerce Commission to investigate certain practices and methods of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad I was selected as a target for abuse and vilification by one E. B. Stahlman, formerly a vice president, a legislative agent, and a lobbyist of that company, and now publisher of the Nashville Banner, and very generally believed in Tennessee still to have connections with that railroad.

Coincident with the publication on Thursday last of the preliminary report by the Interstate Commerce Commission in response to the Senate resolution directing that this investigation be made the said E. B. Stahlman published a more aggravated attack on me than theretofore on the first page of the same issue of his paper, in which on an inside page was published the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission, apparently as if to break the force of the astounding story of debauchery through free passes by this railroad which Stahlman served so long as lobbyist.

I replied, answering his charges, establishing their falsity by the testimony of disinterested parties, men of the highest character, and laid bare his record as investigated and exposed by a Senate committee.

On July 14, 1914, there appeared the following dispatch from Nashville in the Washington Herald:

[Special to the Washington Herald.]

NASHVILLE, TENN., July 13, 1914.—Branding Senator LUKE LEA as "scion of an honored, wealthy family, gotten down to the low level of a holdup bandit and plain grafter," E. B. Stahlman, owner of the Nashville Banner, to-day, in print, charged LEA with grafting $10,000 from the erstwhile judiciary committee and also $10,000 from Republicans of the State to aid the fusion cause.

LEA, owner of a rival paper, and Stahlman are waging a bitter war in print, LEA having previously denounced Stahlman. Until a few months ago they were fast friends.

While the charges relate to a time several years ago, some months before I was either a candidate for or elected to the Senate, the only office I have ever held or have ever been a candidate for, still if I am the creature he describes I would be unfit for membership in this body or association with decent men.

Fortunately for me the character of E. B. Stahlman, who makes these charges, is not only well known in Tennessee but in Washington, where he was once the subject of a senatorial investigation. The said Stahlman, in addition to being the lobbyist of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad, of which he was vice president for many years, would lobby for any concern which desired legislation by any public body and would pay the hire of a lobbyist.

He was at one time employed to lobby through Congress a claim of the Methodist Publishing House of approximately $300,000. He entered into a solemn, written contract with the agents of the publishing house by which he was to receive 35 per cent of any amount collected on this claim, a copy of which contract, as published in the report of the Senate investigating committee, I will, in the absence of objection, incorporate in my remarks without reading:

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT BETWEEN BARBEE & SMITH, BOOK AGENTS OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH SOUTH, AND E. B. STAHLMAN.

Witness:

First. That we, Barbee & Smith, book agents of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, do hereby give power of attorney to the said E. B Stahlman to prosecute our claim before the Congress of the United States, for the use and abuse of the publishing house of the Methodist Episcopal Church South by the Armies of the United States during the war between the States from A. D 1861 to 1865.

Second. We, Barbee & Smith, book agents of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, do hereby agree that the said E. B. Stahlman shall receive as compensation for his services 35 per cent of whatever sum shall be collected from the United States for the liquidation of the aforesaid claim.

Third. It is hereby agreed between Barbee & Smith, book agents of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, party of the first part, and E. B. Stahlman, party of the second part, that should the Congress of the United States make no appropriation for the liquidation of the aforesaid claim, then, in that case, no compensation shall be paid to the said E. B. Stahlman for his services, from any source whatever, and he shall have no recourse upon us or our successors in office forever.

Fourth. We, Barbee & Smith, book agents of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, do hereby agree and covenant that this power of attorney herein and hereby conveyed to the aforesaid E. B. Stahlman shall continue in full force and effect until the final adjournment of the Fifty-fifth Congress of the United States.

(Signed) BARBEE & SMITH,
Book Agents for the M. E. Church South.
E. B. STAHLMAN.

After the bill allowing this claim passed the House and was pending in the Senate, a question of fact was raised by Senators whether Stahlman had a contract for a percentage of this claim as a fee if the claim passed and it became certain that the bill would not pass so as to permit this payment to Stahlman. When the issue was raised Senator Bate, of Tennessee, who was in charge of the bill, received a specific denial from the said E. B. Stahlman that he had any contract or was to receive any fee or any money other than his expenses for his work on the claim which was, as he stated, prompted by his interest in the church.

The bill passed the Senate, the claim was paid by the Government, and Stahlman immediately collected out of the amount paid on the claim a sum in excess of $100,000. The matter then became the subject of a senatorial investigation and the Senate Committee on Claims reported in part as follows, the full report being found in volume 8, Senate Report No. 1416.

> Mr. Stahlman admits he intended that they [Senators] should receive this impression from what he said, and a fair interpretation of his words meant that there was no contract and that he was not connected in the case on account of money consideration. They were deceived and misled, and the deception was willful and deliberate on Mr. Stahlman's part.

In CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 31, part 6, page 5077, is found the following extract from a speech of Senator Hale, of Maine:

> Does the Senator believe that this lobbyist, who has looted this great appropriation that Congress gave to this religious society, has ever in any way contributed to the passage of the bill? Did it not go through entirely outside of him?

On page 5804 of the same volume of the RECORD is found the following extract from a speech of Senator TILLMAN, of South Carolina:

> I hope (the church) will make this thief and liar, Stahlman, disgorge.

In the same volume of the RECORD, page 5806, is found the following extract from a speech of Senator Morgan, of Alabama:

> If this man Stahlman, who seems to be a German and who has floated into the case somewhere or other and somehow or other, has violated, as he seems to have violated, his duty and the obligations of a man to tell the truth, under the circumstances, if he has done so, that man will be tabooed. He is worse ruined now than if he had succeeded in getting a hundred million dollars out of this thing. There is no chance to put him in any worse attitude than he is to-day.

On page 5801 of the same volume of the RECORD is found the following extract from a speech of Senator Bacon, of Georgia:

> In my conversation with the Senator from Tennessee and others before going to see Mr. Stahlman no mention was made of any percentage, and in my conversation with Mr. Stahlman there was no mention of any percentage. It was simply a question whether or not there was a large fee to be paid to him or others out of the recovery on account of this claim of the Methodist Book Concern, and his assurance to me was that there was no such contract, but there would necessarily be some expenses to be paid.

Inasmuch as this man is attempting to destroy my character and to blacken my reputation, it is proper to place before my colleagues the estimate he placed upon his own veracity, or rather, lack of veracity.

In Senate Document Report No. 1416 is found the following statement, under oath, by E. B. Stahlman:

> Well, then, make me the martyr. I made the denial. Peter denied his Lord three times. He told a story. I do not claim to be better than Peter. If Peter was forgiven—and Peter is the rock upon which the church was founded—Stahlman can be forgiven for the crime he has committed, if crime it be.

These proofs of Stahlman's lack of character and want of veracity were embalmed in the archives of this Government before I was a Member of this body and at a time when I was absent from Nashville, being at college, and I did not know of them until long afterwards. Recently, since his attacks on me, I investigated these reports, of which I had gained information, and published his record as laid bare by the report of the Committee on Claims, the speeches of Senators, and his own confession under oath.

Since this man has branded himself and has been branded by a report of a committee of this body and by Senators familiar with the transaction, it is unnecessary for me to characterize him or the charges he has made against me other than to pronounce them as utterly and absolutely false.

In conclusion, I have naught in my private life or as a public official which I desire to conceal from my colleagues or from the public, and I would welcome any action that the Senate might deem proper to take upon these charges made by this characterless creature, whose record in all the nakedness of its dishonor has been exposed to this body.

The meaning of this attack must be as obvious to all as it is to me. It is intended to be a painful lesson to me and a blackhand warning to others not to dare to train the pitiless light of publicity upon the nefarious conduct of lawbreaking corporations and their corrupt lobbyists.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, July 16, 1914, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, July 15, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, in whom all our longings, hopes, and aspirations are centered, quicken us in Thine own way that we may be true to the better instincts of our nature and live to the standard of values illustrated in the life and precepts of the Christ and go on our way rejoicing, assured that all will be well; for Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the Clerk will call the roster of the committees.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow be substituted for to-day—for business in order to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that to-morrow be substituted for to-day for the consideration of Calendar Wednesday business. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MONDELL. To reserve the right to object. Those of us who are interested in the bill for the extension of the period for payments on reclamation projects have been waiting several weary months for an opportunity for the consideration of that legislation. Other measures have gotten in the way. On a motion made on the other side two weeks ago Calendar Wednesday was dispensed with. We have now reached the time for the consideration of that bill. I do not know of anything pending that is so urgent as to justify dispensing with Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, this is only to substitute to-morrow for to-day.

Mr. MANN. Let me make a suggestion that possible will meet with approval. Will it be agreeable to everybody if we substitute to-morrow for to-day, with the understanding that when the deficiency bill is finished to-day, if it shall be finished before the time for adjournment, it shall be in order to proceed with the reclamation bill, which will be the first bill on the call on Calendar Wednesday and which might give a little additional time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have no objection if those in favor of the dam bill do not object. My only desire in the matter is to dispose of the general deficiency bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I want to suggest to the gentleman from Wyoming that, as I understand it, this is merely a postponement for one day, and it is really for the expediting of this bill. I feel that it would be beneficial to our hearing to have it go over until to-morrow. I think the suggestion made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is eminently fair and proper.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Nebraska rise?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. I want to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York will give his attention.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Does the gentleman think it is probable the general deficiency bill can be completed in time this afternoon to enter upon consideration of the reclamation bill?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not think this bill will take very much time. I think there are one or two items on which there may be a little discussion, but the bill consists mostly of public-building items, audited claims, and judgments.

Mr. MANN. There are very few matters of possible controversy in the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think only two or three items that will occasion any discussion in the House.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Will there be any general debate permitted?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The general debate is ended. Last night it was agreed that one gentleman might speak 10 minutes under the 5-minute rule. In consideration of that he agreed to forego the right to take 25 minutes. That is the only thing left. The general debate is closed.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. We have been disappointed a good many times. I am not making any complaints. We have miscalculated about getting consideration of this bill, so that the interests of our constituents have been delayed, and they have been disappointed frequently. I would like it very much if we could get to the consideration of the bill to-day, and begin it, anyway. As far as I am concerned, I shall not interpose any objection, if the arrangement is made with the understanding that we are to get through with the deficiency bill in time to take up the irrigation bill to-day.

Mr. MONDELL. Do I understand that the gentleman from New York accepts the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will not object to it.

Mr. MONDELL. That we put Calendar Wednesday over until to-morrow, but that if we get through with the deficiency bill this afternoon in time to begin the general debate, we will take up the extension bill at that time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have no objection to that.

Mr. RAKER. If the request made by the gentleman from Illinois is agreed to, and the House finishes the consideration of the deficiency bill some time in the middle of the afternoon, and if the reclamation extension bill is then taken up, that will not count as a day on the committee time. The committee will still have their regular two days allowed by the rule?

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes. Mr. Speaker, supplementing the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow be substituted for to-day as Calendar Wednesday, but that when the deficiency bill now pending is concluded to-day, it shall be in order to proceed with the consideration of Senate bill 4628 for the remainder of the day.

The SPEAKER. Before the Chair puts that question, he wants to understand: Is this fragment of a day to be counted against Calendar Wednesday, or are you to have Calendar Wednesday plus the fraction?

Mr. GARNER. Plus the fraction.

Mr. MANN. Plus the fraction.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then, if we finish the deficiency at any time to-day, we will begin Calendar Wednesday, but extend it during to-morrow?

Mr. MANN. No; not begin Calendar Wednesday, but begin the consideration of that bill, so that it will be in order to take up the bill for the remainder of the day.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not see how that can prejudice the regular order at all.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; not at all.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asks unanimous consent that to-morrow be substituted for Calendar Wednesday; and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] supplements that with the request for unanimous consent that if we finish the deficiency bill in time to-day, the fragment of the day remaining shall be devoted to the consideration of the irrigation bill, S. 4628, and that that shall not be counted as against to-morrow as Calendar Wednesday. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, of course that means that there will be no interference with the ordinary day program as applied to the bill?

Mr. MANN. This day would not be counted as a part of Calendar Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. No; this day will not be so counted.

Mr. MANN. It will be considered under a special order to-day.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That ought to be understood.

Mr. MANN. It is understood.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 17824, the general deficiency bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. ADAMSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the general deficiency bill, of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17824) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1914 and for prior years, and for other purposes.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

To enable the President to meet unforeseen emergencies arising in the Diplomatic and Consular Service, and to extend the commercial and other interests of the United States, and to meet the necessary expenses attendant upon the execution of the neutrality act, to be expended pursuant to the requirement of section 291 of the Revised Statutes, to continue available during the fiscal year 1915, $25,000.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee if this is the appropriation out of which Mr. Lind, the commissioner to Mexico, was paid?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is the information furnished to the committee.

Mr. GILLETT. I would like further to ask the gentleman if he can inform the House what compensation has been paid to Mr. Lind for his services? He was appointed by the President, and, as I understand, ensconced himself on the outskirts of Mexico and there, without any knowledge of the language or the temperament of the Mexicans, was expected to be the one source of information of our administration upon the conditions in Mexico. Now his service is terminated, and it seems to me that it is no more than proper that we should know what the expense of his mission has been, although it seems to me it was dear at any price.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I do not know the compensation paid to Mr. Lind, and it seemed to the representative of the Department of State to be inexpedient to make public at this time the compensation paid for his services.

Mr. GILLETT. May I ask the gentleman if the Secretary of State appeared before the committee?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; he did not.

Mr. GILLETT. Did any Assistant Secretary of State appear?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No.

Mr. GILLETT. Did anybody appear whose judgment on the propriety of divulging these facts would carry weight?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Carr, the employee of the State Department, who has served there for many, many years, director of the Consular Service, who has had the confidence and respect and esteem of several Republican administrations, appeared before it. This gentleman, who had been in the innermost confidence of the Republican administrations in diplomatic affairs, said that in his opinion it was inexpedient at this time to state for public information the compensation paid to Mr. Lind. It was due to the belief that a statement of the compensation at this time, in view of the unsettled conditions in Mexico, might provoke controversy and discussion that would not be conducive to the amicable adjustment of affairs in Mexico.

The gentleman from Massachusetts himself appreciated the, perhaps, impropriety of making this information public at this time. The record before the committee discloses this fact:

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Carr, I would like to ask a question, although I appreciate that you may not think it wise to answer—

Mr. GILLETT, of course, knew that Mr. Carr had had a long experience in the State Department under Republican administrations, which qualified him peculiarly to determine whether it would be wise to make this information public, and therefore he said—

although I appreciate you may not think it wise to answer; and if so, I will not urge you. Is there any objection to your stating what has been paid to Mr. Lind?

I think that shows the opinion of the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, who is a man of great experience in the House and one intimately acquainted with the delicacy of adjusting a situation such as exists in Mexico to-day.

Mr. Carr said:

Mr. CARR. I do not know what amount, if any, was paid; but I should think there might be objection to making public any amount that may have been paid——

Mr. GILLETT (interposing). Is the Secretary himself in the city?

Mr. CARR. The Secretary is in the city and was not able to be at this hearing this morning owing to the fact that he had to attend the funeral of the late minister from Venezuela. The question you ask is one which I could not answer categorically.

Mr. GILLETT. I appreciate that.

Mr. CARR. But my own judgment would be it would be inexpedient to state that compensation.

Mr. GILLETT. I would like to ask you, if it is proper for you to state it, whether Mr. Lind is still being paid out of this fund.

Mr. CARR. I do not know, but I think he is not being paid.

Mr. GILLETT. You do not know?

Mr. CARR. I do not know, but my opinion is that he is not.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. FLOOD of Virginia). The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask that my time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, all this is a matter that very properly should come up under general debate. It is now turning out just as I expected it would turn out.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am explaining an item in the bill.

Mr. DONOVAN. Yes; but that is not the purpose of the thing.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am making this statement for the RECORD, so that the public will not be misled by ingenious statements made by partisan opponents.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this emergency fund is provided for the Department of State because it is realized that in conducting all of our relations with foreign countries it is essential that the President be in a position to utilize the services of men in whom he has confidence to be sent upon many missions of vital importance to the welfare of the United States. No one, Mr. Chairman, can determine as to the wisdom of a particular selection by the President other than himself. He must have confidence in the person selected. It is not enough that gentlemen in other branches of the public service, or that persons outside of the public service, have confidence in some individual. The President must have confidence in the individual.

Who is John Lind? I know him personally. I served with him in this House; the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] has personal acquaintance with him. In the Biographical Congressional Directory, edition of 1913, I find the following:

John Lind: A Representative from Minnesota; born in Sweden, March 24, 1854; attended the public schools and the State University of Minneapolis; taught school, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1877. Practiced in New Ulm, Minn. Appointed receiver of the Tracy land office in 1881. Elected as a Republican to the Fiftieth, Fifty-first, and Fifty-second Congresses—March 4, 1887–March 3, 1893. Served in the Spanish War as quartermaster of the Twelfth Minnesota Regiment of Volunteers. Elected governor of Minnesota in 1898 as a Democrat. Elected as a Democrat to the Fifty-eighth Congress—March 4, 1903–March 3, 1905. Resumed the practice of law in Minneapolis, Minn. President of the board of regents of the University of Minnesota.

I imagine, Mr. Chairman, that most of the criticism that has been indulged in by Republicans of the President, because of the selection of Mr. John Lind for the delicate and important mission entrusted to him, is due to the fact that although he had started in public life as a Republican, and had been elected to this House three times as a Republican, his high, honorable, and sensitive nature could no longer tolerate the practices and conduct of the Republican Party, and he therefore renounced that party, and was triumphantly elected as governor of his State as a candidate on the Democratic ticket. [Applause on the Democratic side.] He was afterwards elected to this House as a Democrat. He is one of the most distinguished lawyers in the great northwest country. He is a man of culture and refinement and scholarly attainments, having served as president of the board of regents of the State university. I can understand how the selection of this man of such distinction, attainments, and culture must rile to the very depths oldtime standpat Republicans. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I have no doubt, Mr. Chairman, the country will heartily approve every act of the President, done by him in his efforts to bring order out of chaos, to restore peace and tranquillity and orderly and constitutional government to the disheartened and troubled people of Mexico, and he has the good wishes and the prayers of every good and patriotic man in this country, in Mexico, and in every other country in the civilized world that his efforts may be successful. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman quotes the questions that I put to Mr. Carr as indicating that I recognized the impropriety of this information being given. I did recognize the very possible impropriety of Mr. Carr giving that information, because I recognized that Mr. Carr was neither the Secretary nor the Assistant Secretary, but was merely the chief of a bureau. I recognized that it was not——

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOVAN. Under the five-minute rule there can be only two speeches, one for and one against an amendment. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] has already spoken upon his motion. He has no right to speak again on that motion to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of the gentleman from Connecticut is well taken.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Continuing where I was so courteously interrupted by the gentleman from Connecticut——

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOVAN. The rule says that in all cases the five-minute debate in the Committee of the Whole shall be confined to the subject. I propose to make the point of order against the gentleman from Massachusetts unless he confines his remarks to the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts will proceed in order.

Mr. GILLETT. I certainly will, Mr. Chairman; and I will continue to confine myself to the subject as I have before. As I say, Mr. Carr, who represented the State Department, was only the head of a bureau, and I recognized that he probably——

Mr. DONOVAN. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman is not speaking to the amendment, under the five-minute rule, as required by the rule. It is immaterial to us what Mr. Carr or anyone else does. We are reading this bill under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is to strike out the last two words, and the Chair thinks the gentleman from Massachusetts is discussing this amendment.

Mr. MANN rose.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois does not have any standing unless the Chair wishes to hear him on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not know why the gentleman from Illinois rose.

Mr. MANN. I am standing, Mr. Chairman, but the House would be better off if the gentleman from Connecticut were sitting all of the time. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, again, I appreciated that Mr. Carr very probably would not feel that he could properly take the responsibility of giving us this information, because he was merely the head of a bureau, and that information was a matter of probable——

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. The gentleman from Massachusetts is not speaking to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks he is.

Mr. DONOVAN. What? In speaking of Mr. Carr?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is discussing the appropriation of $25,000, which he moved to strike out.

Mr. GILLETT. And Mr. Carr, therefore, as I say, might very properly feel a delicacy about making the statement, but neither the Secretary of State nor any of his assistants came before the committee. If this had been under a Republican administration, I might have thought that very possibly it was so unusual that the Secretary of State and his assistants had stayed away in order not to be examined on some such question, but I recognize that under this administration the heads of the different departments are not in the habit of coming before the Committee on Appropriations to give us the information that we desire.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I renew the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Massachusetts is discussing the amendment which he offered.

Mr. GILLETT. And therefore I was not surprised that the Secretary of State and his assistants stayed away, because that is their habit, and therefore I would not suggest that it was done in order to avoid examination or giving information on this subject. But it does seem to me to be very proper now, when the mission of Mr. Lind is terminated, that we should know the amount which his services cost the Government.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the question before the committee is not as to the standing and character of John Lind. Most of us know him as an honorable gentleman and as a man——

Mr. DONOVAN. A point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. Of high character, a gentleman, and a scholar——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOVAN. There can be only one speech for a motion and one against under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is opposing the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. MONDELL. I am.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. Whatever we may think as to the mission——

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the committee is the one who is opposing this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Connecticut that the gentleman from Massachusetts offered an amendment at the time the gentleman from New York took his seat.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We will make much more progress if the gentleman from Connecticut will permit this discussion to go on.

Mr. DONOVAN. I suggest the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will proceed in a parliamentary way by addressing the Chair before taking the floor and injecting remarks into the discussion.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Connecticut has not addressed the Chair.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is not in the Chair, but he imagines he is in it all the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized.

Mr. MONDELL. This is not a question, Mr. Chairman, of the character and ability of John Lind. The question is as to what has been the outcome of Mr. Lind's mission, and I do not believe that anyone is well enough satisfied with the outcome to believe that Mr. Lind's services have been particularly valuable to the country. My personal opinion is that Mr. Lind is not responsible for that fact, but that his instructions were of such a character that he was forced to be the representative of the so-called constitutionalists and their aid rather than the representative of the people of the United States. But, Mr. Chairman, this item covers other expenditures. It covers the expenditures which arose out of the mediation conference at Niagara Falls. Some inquiry was made by the members of the subcommittee relative to the amount of money there expended; but, proceeding properly under his instructions, I assume Mr. Carr could not give the committee information on that point.

It is a matter of very great interest to the country to know just how much of this money we spent for this mediation conference in view of what we got out of it. The net result of the conference as found in the protocols which were signed and accepted on behalf of the United States were that, "The Government of the United States of America will not in any form whatsoever claim a war indemnity or other international satisfaction" for occurrences in Mexico up to that time, and further, we agree and pledge ourselves to recognize any bandit government which may be established by the so-called constitutionalists in the City of Mexico.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOVAN. The gentleman from Wyoming is not speaking on the subject matter of the amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, yes, I am, Mr. Chairman; I am discussing the expenditures under this item.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the performance of the gentleman from Connecticut is dilatory, and therefore out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would hardly so hold, but the Chair thinks the latitude allowed in debate will permit the gentleman from Wyoming to proceed on the line he is proceeding.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, we must make these appropriations because the sums provided are necessary to pay the obligations of the Government, but it is regrettable that out of these expenditures so little credit has been obtained for the Government and the people of the United States. I do not blame Mr. Lind altogether for the failure of his mission. I do not blame the honorable gentlemen who were mediators at Niagara Falls for the surrender they made of American rights and claims. I think that those higher in official position than either of those gentlemen are to blame for the fact that we have waived all claims to satisfaction or indemnity of any kind for the indignities we suffered and the losses of our people and that we agree to recognize any kind of a government, military and arbitrary in form as it may be, that may be established by Villa or Zapata or anyone else at Mexico City.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOVAN. Can Members of this House inject remarks here without first obtaining recognition by the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks they ought not to do so.

Mr. DONOVAN. Well, under the rule they are disorderly in so doing. Is that correct?

The CHAIRMAN. According to the rule it is a violation of the rule.

Mr. DONOVAN. I sincerely hope, Mr. Chairman, my distinguished friend, the leader of the minority, the gentleman from Illinois, will pay attention——

Mr. MANN. I raise the point of order that the gentleman from Connecticut did not have——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order the gentleman from Connecticut did not have the floor and therefore was not entitled to address the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Connecticut to make a point of order——

Mr. MANN. There was no point of order——

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; the gentleman submitted a point of order.

Mr. MANN. I beg the Chair's pardon, he did not submit a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut submitted a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MANN. Yes; and after he submitted the parliamentary inquiry he went on with a tirade which was not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman knows it is difficult to take a Member off his feet after he takes the floor.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

Whenever any appropriation comes before the House which relates to the State Department the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] always grows hysterical. He aspires to be the mouthpiece of those whose purpose is to harass, annoy, and interfere with the policy which has been in successful operation in our State Department under the present able and conscientious administration with reference to Mexico.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. The gentleman is not speaking to the amendment. He is striking out the paragraph. The management of the State Department by the Secretary of State has nothing to do with it. Now, they had plenty of time in general debate, Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has stated to the gentleman from Connecticut that under the liberality allowed in debate the discussion by these gentlemen of this item is in order. Their remarks constitute a discussion of the amendment.

Mr. DONOVAN. Will the Chair permit the reading of this clause?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. DONOVAN. This book says:

In all cases the five-minute debate in the Committee of the Whole is confined to the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. These gentlemen are confining themselves to the subject.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is singing the swan song of those who have been greatly disappointed over the outcome of our differences in Mexico. I am sure that in many thousands of American homes to-day fathers and mothers are rejoicing in the fact that this administration has been able, through its wise and peaceful policy, to bring about conditions that will result in peace and good order in that distracted country. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the opposition to the President would welcome a situation there that would involve American life and loss of American property, purely for partisan advantage; but because we have pursued a policy which has resulted in peace and not in bloodshed and which has brought to the Republic of Mexico the dawn of a better and a brighter day, these gentlemen resort to criticism and attack of the State Department which is mainly of a bushwhacking and guerrilla character. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, imputation has been made here—not directly, but indirectly—upon the services which the Hon. John Lind has rendered to the Government as special ambassador to Mexico.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. I decline to yield. Mr. Lind was a most worthy and tactful representative of the American people in a most trying and critical situation. He is an honored son of that great race so many of which settled in the northwestern portion of this country, redeemed it from the wilderness, and made it one of the most prosperous and productive sections of the United States. If I mistake not, Mr. Chairman, citizens of the Scandinavian race will resent at the polls the imputation which has been placed upon Mr. Lind by gentlemen on the other side.

I am acquainted with the honorable gentleman; I have followed his career with interest and admiration. I know that he would not take from the Public Treasury one penny to which he was not entitled and which he had not justly earned. This debate that we are now having with reference to this appropriation simply demonstrates the facts that our Republican friends are trying in some way to impugn the honesty, the ability, and the services which Mr. Lind has so distinctly rendered to this country. The money has been taken from this fund to defray the necessary and ordinary expenses incurred in the negotiations in which Mr. Lind participated; it has been wisely expended in view of his distinguished services and the happy and much desired outcome of the negotiations. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed in 10 minutes.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment, and I would like five minutes on that.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman will yield me one minute at this time it will be sufficient.

Mr. ROGERS. I want about three minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto be concluded in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that all debate on the paragraph and amendments thereto be concluded in 20 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, anent the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], made a few moments ago, I desire to say that less than three years ago the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman made an investigation of the State Department.

Early in our investigation we found what we regarded as an abuse of the authority granted the President and Secretary of State in the use of what is known as the emergency or secret fund. Under section 291 of the Revised Statutes of the United States the President and Secretary of State may report expenditures out of that fund by what is known as a secret certificate, that is, report these expenditures in a lump and not in detail and not disclosing the purposes for which these expenditures were made. I repeat that we found on investigation that some very great abuses had been made of this privilege by the administration.

I early became convinced that there are very few expenditures which can properly be made out of this fund and which may not be reported as other expenditures are reported. In other words, that the cases which ought to be covered by these secret certificates are extremely few, and my opinion in that regard has not changed one iota, notwithstanding the change of the administration.

To be sure, I realize that there are circumstances where the administration must use money out of this fund, and where it would not be expedient or in accordance with public policy to make known at the time the purposes for which these expenditures were made, but I must insist that they are few and far between.

Mr. Chairman, referring again to the remarks of my friend from Massachusetts, I beg to state that of all the people in the world, he and his Republican associates are the last ones who should raise any question about the publication of expenditures of this secret fund, and it is inconsistent for them to insist that the expenditures of this fund should be made public.

I beg to remind him and others that under the Republican administration this fund was used with as much freedom, apparently, by the President and the Secretary of State as if it had been their private funds. The truth is that they not only used all the money which Congress gave them for the emergency or secret fund, but about $155,000 out of other funds during the six fiscal years ending June 30, 1911, covering all these expenditures by secret certificates in settlement with the Treasury Department. To be more explicit, the Republican administration expended during the six fiscal years, to which I have referred, $732,981.52, which was covered by secret certificates in settlement with the Treasury Department.

Mr. GILLETT. How many years?

Mr. HAMLIN. Six; and it will be borne in mind that during that time Congress had only given them $575,000 to be used as an emergency or secret fund, but they expended the amount which I have just given, to wit, $732,981.52, and in order to do that they had to use money out of other funds, which they did without any authority of law whatsoever, arbitrarily covering its expenditure by secret certificates in settlement with the Treasury.

These figures I take from official statement furnished me by a Republican Secretary of the Treasury in a letter, copy of which I will not take time to read, but will insert in my remarks.

Respectfully,

FRANKLIN MACVEAGH, Secretary.

You will observe that this letter only brings it up to March 31, 1911. Recently I asked the Secretary to give me a statement of the disbursement from April 1, 1911, to June 30, 1911, so as to complete the statement for the full six fiscal years—from July 1, 1905, to June 30, 1911:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, October 28, 1911.

Hon. C. W. HAMLIN,
Chairman Committee on Expenditures in State Department,
House of Representatives.

SIR: Replying to your letter of October 24, 1911, I have the honor to inform you that the sum of $13,505.72 was expended by the Department of State and accounted for by certificates of the Secretary of State under section 291, Revised Statutes, United States, for the period April 1 to June 30, 1911, as shown by the files of this department.

Respectfully,

J. F. CURTIS, Acting Secretary.

Thus it will be seen that from July 1, 1905, to June 30, 1911, there was expended through the State Department, under section 291, heretofore quoted, the enormous sum of $732,981.52, or an average of $122.163.58 a year, or an average of $10,180.30 a month, or an average of $339.45 a day.

The then Secretary of State, Mr. Knox, declined, upon an invitation of the committee, to appear before it and explain these extraordinary, as well as enormous, expenditures. He appeared before the committee, but that was only after he was duly subpœnaed to appear. Still he declined to give the committee the information, and then when he was served with a subpœna duces tecum to produce certain vouchers and papers which would disclose the purposes for which this money was expended, he, as well as President Taft, were so determined that not only the public should not know the purposes for which this money was used, but also that a committee of Congress should not know, that the President did the extraordinary and unheard-of thing of issuing Executive Order No. 1382, as follows:

EXECUTIVE ORDER NO. 1382.

No information of any kind whatever shall be furnished by the Secretary of State or any officer or employee of the Department of State to anyone other than an officer of that department entitled thereto for official use in regard to moneys expended and accounted for by certificate in pursuance of section 291 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, except upon due direction in writing from the President, nor shall any vouchers or other papers in relation to such expenditures be produced in pursuance of subpœna or otherwise except upon direction in writing from the President in each case.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, July 7, 1911.

Mr. GILLETT. Was not this done on the ground that it would be prejudicial to the public interests to have them divulged?

Mr. HAMLIN. That was undoubtedly their theory, and in all human probability the present administration may conclude that it is not advisable at this time, for the same reason, to make public the amount of money paid Mr. Lind.

In the light of these facts, certainly it does not become gentlemen on that side of the House to raise any question about the present administration not making public the compensation paid to the Hon. John Lind.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me say this: There was no request from any member of the committee that anybody from the State Department other than Mr. Carr should appear in order to furnish that information.

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman must be mistaken. That is a misstatement that the gentleman ought to correct.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have not yielded to the gentleman from Massachusetts, and as my time is limited I can not do so now.

I want to call the attention of the House to this additional fact: During the six years wherein you expended over $700,000 that you would not account for, and even resorted to a special Executive order to keep from telling what you used the money for, there was no war in existence; there was not a cloud on the horizon; but everybody knows why Hon. John Lind was appointed to go to Mexico. There was at that time a very delicate situation existing between our Government and the one on the other side of the Rio Grande. He went as a confidential agent of the President, and I am certain in my own mind that the President made no mistake in reposing confidence in him, and I can appreciate the facts, as the gentlemen on that side ought to, that it might not contribute to an early and peaceful settlement of the delicate questions between the two Governments to give publicity such as the gentleman from Massachusetts pretends that he wants. At any rate, I am content to put our record up against the Republican record, for I have no doubt that later on, when the war clouds have blown away, the President and Secretary of State will not object to making public the compensation paid Mr. Lind.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, listening to the picture of order and peace having been restored in Mexico by this administration, as painted by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SELDOMRIDGE], it occurred to me that that picture of order and peace and quietude could only have been painted and could only have been imagined by a gentleman from Colorado. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I had intended, in order to obtain five minutes, to introduce an amendment, but under the agreement that is not now necessary.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], who is the great Democratic economist of this House, indicated a little while ago, in a rather apologetic speech, that the Republican Party was responsible for Mr. Carr, the Chief of the Consular Bureau in the State Department, and that Mr. Carr was the spokesman for John Lind, and that therefore the Republican Party is responsible for the condition that prevails in Mexico.

It was rather a far-fetched proposition to thus relieve the Democratic Party and the White House and to unload the Mexico situation upon the Republican Party.

The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SELDOMRIDGE] a moment ago spoke of "the peace and order" and the reign of law that had been "restored" in troubled Mexico. He spoke of the thousands and tens of thousands of mothers who were grateful for the services of John Lind in preventing the destruction of American life in that country. I then thought of the 19 lives of American sailors already taken in Mexico as the result of the administration's policy there. Every one of those 19 lives was of value to some mother, to some father, or to brothers and sisters in this country. They were laid down upon the altar—shall we say of liberty or of honor? We do not know, except that they responded to the policy of the administration.

Now, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] rose very properly, as I conceive it, to inquire not only what was paid to our so-called American emissary to Mexico, but also to ascertain, if possible, just what services were performed by him in Mexico. This Congress has no information as to what John Lind did in Mexico; it has no information as to the services he performed there to restore law and order. All this Congress knows about Mr. Lind's services comes from ordinary newspaper sources, and much of it has come recently from Niagara Falls, and not from Mexico. Hence it would seem as if the inquiry of the gentleman from Massachusetts was entirely appropriate.

The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations on two or three occasions has been unable to answer why a responsible head of a department has not appeared before his committee to explain demands for money. In the case of the Labor Department recently it appeared that more than $2,000,000 had been appropriated to the Bureau of Immigration at the request not of the Secretary or any Assistant Secretary of the Department of Labor, but at the request of one of the inspectors of the Bureau of Immigration; and upon his representation more than $2,000,000 was appropriated, and this Congress, representing the people and entitled to know, was satisfied.

Now, if there is one thing that the people of this country have been inquiring about recently it is just what the present situation in Mexico is. They want to know why we interfered in Mexico and what our policy is. If any gentleman upon the other side, making appropriations for the payment of the expenses of John Lind or any other emissary of the Government, knows what our Mexican policy is, I suggest that he state it now. It is proper that we should know. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, on the 14th of June last I received a letter from a Greek constituent of mine telling me that his property rights in Asia Minor were being invaded by the Turks, and asking me to take up with the State Department the question of what could be done in his behalf.

I took up the question by telephone with the State Department on the following day, and was advised that if I would send to the department a copy of the letter which I had received prompt attention would be given to the case. So on the 15th of June I wrote the State Department, inclosing a copy of the letter from my constituent, and asking for a report.

I understand it is a rule of the various departments—whether by courtesy or custom I do not know—to answer letters from Members of Congress either on the day on which they are received or on the following day. It may be that only an acknowledgment can be given at that time; but, at all events, it is the custom to make at least the prompt acknowledgment. On the 29th of June, just two weeks after I had originally taken up the matter with the State Department, I having received neither information nor acknowledgment, I wrote the department a further letter, asking the courtesy of at least a reply. Last Saturday I had still heard nothing. So I went to the Department of State and talked with the man in charge of the case. He told me that he had dictated a letter to me about it. That letter has not yet arrived. It may have been dictated, but at all events four or five days have elapsed, and in the meantime nothing has been heard.

Mr. Chairman, I do not pretend that these questions come under the personal supervision of the Secretary of State; but it strikes me that there may be an illustration of the "Like master, like man" principle here. If the Secretary of State himself is off junketing or chautauquaing, it is not to be expected that his subordinates will show the same zeal in the performance of their public duties as if they had a brighter example as a beacon on their path. As I say, over four weeks have elapsed on a question which is inherently an emergency matter and not even an acknowledgment has yet been received from the Department of State. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the critics of the present administration, evidently feeling that somehow or some way they have failed to create the effect intended by a criticism of its economic and fiscal policies, turn ever and anon to a criticism of its conduct of foreign affairs, and they speak with particular reference to the conduct of affairs as regards the Republic of Mexico, because, forsooth, that is close by and is attracting the greatest amount of public attention.

Mr. Chairman, I do not profess to know the details of the policy or the purpose of the administration as regards the Republic of Mexico, and yet I presume that I know as much of it as the great majority of those who have seen fit to criticize that policy. But, sir, there are two elements of that policy that stand out with such conspicuousness that all of us can and do understand them. Those two policies, fundamental in their character, I approve without reservation. One of them is that, if this administration can with honor prevent it, the sons of the mothers of this Republic shall not be sent there to die in useless battles, and that everything that can with honor be done shall be done to prevent the sacrifice of the sons of this Republic in a war for which there is no legitimate occasion. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The other policy, Mr. Chairman, is that this administration will not recognize as the President of the Republic of Mexico Mr. Victoriano Huerta. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], addressing the committee yesterday afternoon, said that the administration would not recognize the Federal Government in Mexico. Not so, Mr. Chairman. No utterance of the President of the United States has ever been given which was entitled to that construction. What the President of the United States has said, what he has made clear, is that this Government will not recognize one who has risen to his place by virtue of participation in or connivance with assassination. [Applause.] I agree with that policy. For a hundred years it has been the curse of the Republics to the south of us that revolutions have been encouraged; that a rise to power by means of assassination has been encouraged. I think the time has come in the economy of events and in the progress of civilization when this great Republic, the master spirit of the Western World, ought to let it be known that men can not rise to power by the practice of murder and assassination and receive the recognition of this Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL and Mr. KAHN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is limited to 20 minutes, and 19 minutes have been consumed. The purpose of the Chair was to recognize the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for three minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will not object. The gentleman is from Minnesota, and I understand his purpose; but I shall object to further extensions.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] asks unanimous consent that he be permitted to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I have never had any faith in the policy of the present administration in reference to its dealings with Mexico and the troubles confronting that country to-day. I have less faith in that policy now than I have ever had in the past, because of recent developments. But inasmuch as extended discussion has occurred respecting Mr. John Lind, of my State, I desire to say something in his behalf; not that a word is necessary in this presence, but that a proper estimate of the man may be given at this time and in this place.

For four years Mr. John Lind was an honored Member of this body. He was one of the most distinguished governors the State of Minnesota ever had. For many years he has been one of the most public-spirited and prominent citizens of that State. He is to-day unquestionably one of the half dozen ablest lawyers in the entire Northwest. He is a man of the highest intelligence, of unimpeachable and unassailable integrity, broad-minded, square, and honest. For many years Mr. Lind was the able president of the board of regents of the University of Minnesota, one of the largest institutions of learning in America, of which institution I am a graduate. His services there were of such a broad-minded and efficient character that the period of the greatest development of that university is coincident with the period of his work. He is one of the big men of the United States; and the people of my State hold him in the highest esteem. I can not imagine how any man could have been selected by the present administration more fitted for such a mission than was Mr. Lind. I myself believe that the instructions given him and the policy he was required to carry out are responsible entirely and alone for the deplorable conditions that have resulted lately in Mexico; but I do wish to say that, while Mr. John Lind is a member of a political organization different from my own, I honor him as I honor few men in my State, and I feel myself proud to be called his friend. I desire to make this statement in order that it may go into the RECORD in connection with the other remarks. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, let the Clerk read.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF EQUIPMENT.

To pay voucher in favor of the Autographic Register Co. for wireless telegraph forms and carbon paper furnished during the fiscal year 1910, $32.50.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I am the Member to whom the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] referred in connection with the understanding by which the general debate was closed last evening.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, last night the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] agreed not to use the 25 minutes allotted to him in general debate so that the debate might be concluded, on condition that during the 5-minute debate he might speak for 5 minutes. I ask unanimous consent that he may address the committee for 10 minutes, in accordance with that understanding.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] may be permitted to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, about two weeks ago the gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY] presented to this House a resolution fixing the time for the adjournment of this Congress. He spoke very briefly upon the subject, and at the conclusion of his remarks the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the leader of the majority of this House, very wisely moved that the House then and there adjourn without any further discussion of that subject.

Under the same direction the business in this House has been so arranged that there has been no further discussion of the resolution, and, so far as I know, there is no intention or prospect of its being taken up. And yet it is one that ought to be considered. The people of this Nation have become impressed with profound distrust of the ability of this Congress to legislate for its benefit. At the very time when the gentleman from New York rose to present his resolution I had in my hand to present to this House a resolution adopted by the chamber of commerce of the largest city of my State, praying also that this Congress would adjourn; that no further legislation be enacted at this time in view of what had already been placed on the statute books and the effect which it had had on the country. This petition was one of many which I have received, one of hundreds which have been received by the Members of this House.

Yesterday we listened to a long dissertation by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] undertaking to show that the country was in fact prosperous and contented so far as business conditions were concerned, but he neglected to consider the most important branch of statistics connected with that matter.

Last February, or January, I think it was, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] was attempting to show that this country was prospering under a Democratic tariff, and at that time I called his attention to the fact that in the month of December last we had reached the peak, so far as the amount of liability in commercial failures was concerned, and also so far as the number was concerned; that over 2,500 firms had failed that month, with liabilities aggregating $31,000,000, but we were assured that conditions would shortly become better, and that we could adjust ourselves to the new tariff.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No; I have lost 15 minutes by coming in at this time; I can not yield. I am sorry.

Mr. GORDON. I thought you would not.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. But we have at this time the statistics for failures for the first six months of this year. Perhaps my friend from Georgia would like to know something more on the subject, and if so, he shall have it. For the first six months of this year the liabilities of commercial failures have reached the astonishing and stupendous aggregate of $185,000,000, more than $50,000,000 more than they have aggregated before in that period in the history of the country and more than three times what they were 10 years ago; and still the gentleman tells us that business is prosperous and business men are contented and happy.

Why, Mr. Chairman, if we needed any other indication, we only need to look at the railroad returns for the last month for which we have statistics—the month ending May 31 of this year. The revenues of the New York Central lines alone fell off for the month of May over $4,000,000 as compared with the same month of 1913. The revenue of the Pennsylvania lines fell off for the same month over four and a half million dollars, as compared with the same month of last year. The building permits in 118 principal cities of our country for the month of April fell off over $15,000,000. Is it strange that the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] finds there is no demand for lumber? Whichever direction we turn we find the same conditions. The importations of foreign goods are steadily increasing and our exports are falling off. A river of gold is flowing toward Europe to make up for the loss in our balance of trade.

Gentlemen were endeavoring to show that pig-iron furnaces were in full blast. We made nearly 4,000,000 tons less of pig iron in the first six months of this year than we did in the first five months of last year. The steel companies are all working under 40 per cent less orders than they had a year ago.

But I can not fully go into this subject. I did not rise to speak upon it, but rather on another subject that was brought up by the gentleman from North Carolina, who I am glad to see in his seat. I have for the gentleman the highest respect and also an affectionate regard, but I am compelled to object at this time to some statements he made, although I understand they were not made with the intention of reflecting upon me or any other Member on this side to whom he referred. A few days ago he read what he called the roll of honor of men on this side who had voted for some of the antitrust bills, and among those names was my own.

Now, I think if the gentleman had heard some remarks that I made at the time, or had taken the trouble to read them, for which I do not blame him if he did not, he would have scarcely included me in that roll of honor. I said at the time, and I say now, that I would not have voted for the bill if I had supposed that it would ever come back from the Senate as it went from the House, and it is quite evident now that when it comes back it is not going to be in such a shape that its framers will recognize it. The father will not know the child.

I said also at that time, and I think I was expressing the sentiments of a large number of Members on this side who voted for the same bills, that the antitrust bill—the Clayton bill—intentionally or unintentionally, was drawn so as to put the Members on this side who voted for or against the bill in a false light. It contained one or two good provisions. It reaffirmed legislation to which we have always expressed our adherence. It attempted to reach practices which I and others on this side have denounced, and which we said were already covered by provisions of the present law. But gentlemen on the other side said that they were not so covered. If we voted against the bill, we exposed ourselves to the charge that we had abandoned the principles which we had always fought for and advocated, and I declined, Mr. Chairman, for myself, to walk into such a trap. And others on this side refused to walk into the trap also.

But the gentleman from North Carolina says we are responsible for the Clayton bill by reason of our vote. I am not inclined to share the responsibility. We no more consented to that bill being rammed down our throats than an English suffragette when put in a strait-jacket and a reverse stomach pump put in her mouth consents to take the food forced down her gullet.

We protested, we objected, we offered amendment after amendment to take out what we deemed to be useless and what I might say at this time seemed to be senseless provisions of the bill, for some of them were senseless; and the only result of our labors was that the much-vaunted personal criminal liability section was modified, and if it had not been modified this House would have been the laughingstock of the legal world. We responsible for that bill? I think everything of the gentlemen on the other side. I know them to be courteous and affable, pleasant and accommodating gentlemen, as a rule. The exceptions are so few that I would not consider them. I would do almost anything for them, and I do not wonder that they are looking for some one to divide the load; but I decline to share the responsibility for this legislation. If it passes the Senate and is successful in practice, they will get the credit for it; if it is a failure—and, even when amended, I predict the antitrust bill will be—they must bear the brunt and the burden. In any event, they afford no remedy for business conditions and are no excuse for prolonging this session. We should adjourn as quickly as possible and give the country a chance to recover from the effect of what this Congress has already done.

Comparison of failures for first 6 months of each of last 10 years, as shown by R. G. Dun & Co.'s mercantile reports.

The Clerk read as follows:

To reimburse the appropriation "Tabulating equipment, Office of Auditor for Post Office Department," fiscal year 1914, for tabulating equipment, rental of machines, and purchase of cards for the Office of the Auditor for the Interior Department to the close of the fiscal year 1914, $5,194.19.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask some information about this $5,194.19. How much of that is for these machines and how much for new equipment? I see there are no hearings upon that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We had the information upon that item in the consideration of a former bill. The Auditor for the Post Office Department furnished to the Auditor for the Interior Department different materials and supplies on hand, to that extent, and it is necessary to reimburse the appropriation in order to enable other bills that were incurred to be paid.

Mr. BRYAN. He furnished them to the Auditor for the Interior Department?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. So this is a refund?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes. The information upon it was obtained on a previous bill.

Mr. BRYAN. There has always been a scarcity of testimony when it comes to the renting of these tabulating machines down there, except when the gentleman from Virginia or some one is giving them a pretty hard knock in suggesting that they have been thrown out of some other department, and that is the only time that we hear much about them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The information about this item was obtained on a former deficiency bill, and it was not repeated.

Mr. BRYAN. Does the gentleman know the name of the company that gets that rent?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not.

Mr. BRYAN. It is a Georgetown company, is it not?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I know nothing about it. All I know is that the machines are rented.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Winchester, Mass., post office: For site and commencement, $15,000.

Mr. DEITRICK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 17, strike out the figures "$15,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$20,000."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, there is no objection to this amendment. Since the bill was reported supplementary estimates have come from the Treasury Department asking $20,000 to be appropriated instead of $15,000, as originally requested.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

CUSTOMS SERVICE.

To defray the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs, $300,000.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Will the gentleman kindly explain whether there is anything new in this $300,000 item? Is it an exigency of the service?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, it is due to the fact that the appropriation made was $300,000 less than it cost to administer the service. In the reorganization of the Customs Service $10,150,000 was appropriated, and the law required the service to be reorganized so as to effect a saving, I think it was, of $350,000. That was upon the theory that the cost of the service was $10,500,000. As a matter of fact, the expenditures in the year previous, on which it was being based, was $10,700,000 or more. There has been an actual saving of over $300,000, and with the readjustments that are going on the officials of the Treasury Department state that during this fiscal year it will not cost in excess of $10,150,000.

Mr. MOORE. This does not contemplate the use of any money for extra service on account of income-tax collections or anything of that kind?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; this is the customs service entirely.

Mr. MOORE. And due to the reorganization?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; it was expected that under the reorganization the service would be conducted for $10,150,000. That was due to a misunderstanding of the total cost of the service the preceding year upon which the saving was estimated. They are making readjustments and changes, and the result will be that this year it will be $10,150,000. The total appropriations for 1912 were $10,850,000, and the actual expense $10,806,000. For 1913 they were $11,000,000 and the actual expense $10,931,000. The President construed the reorganization as shown upon the face of the order issued by him as requiring a decrease in expenditures of $350,000. The decrease actually made by the reorganization was $356,000. We deduct the $356,000 from the amount expended during the fiscal year of 1912, which was $10,806,000, and the result is $10,450,000. If the $356,000 were deducted from the amount actually expended during the fiscal year 1913, the result is $10,575,000, and the statement is made that the expenses have been actually decreased during the fiscal year just ended on an average of $25,000 a month.

Mr. MOORE. The reorganization effected a reduction in the number of customhouses?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Customs districts.

Mr. MOORE. I have a case in mind which was brought to the attention of a committee of which I am a member.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE. It was suggested that there should be a change of the customs headquarters from one section of the State to another. Then came another suggestion by way of compromise that both locations should be recognized as headquarters. Would this appropriation be intended to cover any such proposition as that?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; under the reorganization——

Mr. MOORE. It would be a restoration of the old system in such a case.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The reorganization order fixes the districts, and that fixes the number of collectors of customs. There is not really much interest in having a city designated as headquarters, but the interest is in having a collector assigned to a particular place, and the collectors are not in the classified service.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 10, after line 22, insert:

"Nothing contained in the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1915 shall be construed as relieving street railway companies from bearing all of the expenses of paving streets or avenues between the exterior rails of the tracks of their roads in the District of Columbia, and for a distance of 2 feet from and exterior to such tracks on each side thereof and of keeping the same in repair, as required by section 5 of the act providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia, approved June 11, 1878."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having taken the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution of the following title:

H. J. Res. 300. Joint resolution to continue the provisions of a joint resolution approved June 30, 1914, entitled "Joint resolution extending appropriations for the necessary operations of the Government and of the District of Columbia under certain contingencies."

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1644) for the relief of May Stanley, and for other purposes, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BRYAN, Mr. OVERMAN, and Mr. CRAWFORD as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Refunding taxes: The commissioners are authorized and directed to pay to Charles H. Wiltsie, from the appropriation for "Refunding taxes, etc.," the sum of $35.68, on account of cancellation of certain erroneous tax sales.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I notice this item is in reference to the repayment to Charles H. Wiltsie for an erroneous tax sale and another item in regard to a similar matter. One is for the repayment of $35.68 and the other is authorizing a refund without naming the amount, together with interest at 6 per cent per annum. I would like to inquire if the $35.68 includes interest also?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I did not understand the question of the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Does the $35.68 in this first item include 6 per cent interest as proposed in the succeeding item?

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, if the Chairman will pardon me, my recollection is it does provide for 6 per cent interest. There was some little discussion of it in the committee, not during the hearing, but some little discussion as to how the item was made up, and my recollection is that it does include 6 per cent interest.

Mr. MANN. Where a tax buyer buys property at a tax sale, I never knew one who was especially lenient to the owner of property when it came to adjusting and canceling the title. Now, if a man buys a tax title with the expectation of making a very large profit, why should he receive a reasonable profit if he falls down?

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is what happened——

Mr. MANN. I know what happened. They sold the property erroneously.

Mr. SISSON. Personally I agree absolutely with the gentleman from Illinois, because the statute in my State, for example, does not permit interest, but simply permits him to get the costs and the principal back.

Mr. MANN. He is in great luck to get anything back. He buys at his own risk. If he buys something good he could not lose a cent and if he fails he expects to lose.

Mr. SISSON. I will say to the gentleman, my understanding of this case was it was not exactly on all fours with the redemption of land where the land was properly sold for taxes. This was a sale where they sold the wrong property, and the property which was sold and bought by this man was property which the District had no right to sell. The whole fault was upon the officials of the District. The man whose property was actually sold did not owe any taxes, there were no taxes due the District, and it was a mere error on the part of the officials by which this man made the purchase at the sale, and it was upon that theory that he was allowed interest on his money.

Mr. MANN. Well, it is like buying anything else where the seller has not a good title; he must take his chances.

Mr. SISSON. Caveat emptor.

Mr. MANN. A man takes his chances on many things of this kind. Now, I have no objection to the man receiving the principal, but I do not see why we should pay interest to a tax buyer who is not entitled to a dollar, when, if he had a good title, he would exact not 6 per cent interest, but all the interest that the law allows, which is very likely 25 or 50 per cent.

Mr. SISSON. I think the gentleman is absolutely correct in the principle he lays down, if the District was selling property where the taxpayer was negligent and did not pay his taxes, or where any trouble resulting to the purchaser by virtue of the failure of the District to do its duty shall have happened.

Mr. MANN. Is this man a professional tax buyer?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think he is.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I can say to the gentleman he is a professional.

Mr. MANN. He keeps a record of these things, and he does not rely wholly upon the books of the District for this information.

Mr. SISSON. I will state, as far as I know, I know nothing about his being a professional tax buyer.

Mr. MANN. I will say frankly when the next item is reached, if it is subject to a point I will make it unless the interest is cut out.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

The commissioners are authorized and directed to pay to Charles H. Wiltsie and others, from the appropriation for "Refunding taxes, etc.," the amount of certain taxes and other charges paid by them on account of certain properties erroneously sold at tax sales, together with interest at 6 per cent per annum on said amounts from date of sale to date of payment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. I think it is subject to a point of order. Does not the gentleman think Mr. Wiltsie will think he is in geat luck if he can get the principal without requiring interest at 6 per cent?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not sure about the law; that is the custom. If a locality or municipality sells property at a tax sale, and there is a defect, an error, or mistake—I do not know what the law is here, but I know what the law is in my State of New York—the purchaser of the tax lien receives the money with interest.

Mr. MANN. I would not say the gentleman was mistaken as to New York, because the other day when I thought he was, he ran over me. I doubt if there is a provision anywhere in these cases to pay interest. They refund the principal, but I doubt very much if even in New York they pay the interest.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In New York they pay the interest where through error a sale has been made. The city is required to pay principal and interest.

Mr. MANN. Out of what does it pay the interest? The city does not make the tax sale, I assume.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It does; the collector of assessments and arrears is the official who sells.

Mr. MANN. I do not know, but I suppose that in New York they collect taxes for the State, county, and city?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They are all collected by one official.

Mr. MANN. But he is not a city official.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; he is a city official.

Mr. MANN. Is he a city official and does he collect all the other taxes?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Out of what do they pay the interest? Part of the principal would have gone to the State and part of it would have gone to the county or borough, probably. I do not know how it is in New York. What do they pay the interest out of?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know.

Mr. MANN. I do not believe they pay the interest.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They do.

Mr. MANN. Well, I accept the gentleman's statement, of course.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I know they pay it out of some fund.

Mr. MANN. I think it is not usual, and there is no reason for it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The total amount involved here, as I have just figured, including interest, is $139.

Mr. MANN. I did not know what the amount was. I do not see any reason for paying the interest. Will it be agreeable to the gentleman, or will he consent, to striking out the interest?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will not consent to it, but the gentleman can move to do so.

Mr. MANN. Then I make the point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think this is an appropriation in accordance with the law which provides for refunding.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. This is for refunding something the District of Columbia has never gotten.

Mr. MANN. Where is any such provision of law? There is none that I know anything about.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will indulge me just a moment, I think I can explain the system under which this is done. Mr. Wiltsie, of Syracuse, N. Y., is a professional buyer of property sold at tax sales. He buys thousands of pieces of property sold here in the District of Columbia. The law provides that the owner of the property in getting it back shall pay to him what he paid for it plus interest at the rate of 12 per cent. Mr. Wiltsie has never been known to accept original cost plus that 12 per cent interest. Instead, he requires everyone who is so unfortunate as to have his property sold at tax sale to pay to him the amount of an attorney's fee, which the unfortunate one would have to pay if he went into court with Mr. Wiltsie in order to get the title out of him. He is extortioning upon the people here, and I do not believe that any sort of consideration ought to be shown him in this instance.

Mr. MANN. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw the point of order, and I move to strike out of lines 13 and 14, on page 14, the words:

Together with interest at 6 per cent per annum.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee). The gentleman from Illinois withdraws the point of order and offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MANN. I move to strike out all after the word "sales," in line 13, to the end of the paragraph.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Amend, on page 14, by striking out all of the paragraph after the word "sales" in line 13.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

War Department.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 15, after line 4, insert:

"To enable the commission created by section 26 of the public-buildings act approved May 13, 1908 (Stat. L., vol. 35, p. 543), to procure not exceeding 500 lithograph copies, in colors, of the map authorized in said section of all lands in the District of Columbia in and to which the United States has title, to continue available during the fiscal year 1915, $1,201, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

QUARTERMASTER CORPS.

For transporting and caring for interned Mexican soldiers and military refugees at Fort Wingate, N. Mex., and elsewhere, for the six months commencing July 1, 1914, $170,000, together with the unexpended balance of the appropriation made in the urgent deficiency appropriation act approved April 6, 1914, to reimburse appropriations for support of the Army for expenditures for these purposes made prior to July 1, 1914.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, there are something more than 5,000 of the so-called military refugees held at Fort Wingate and at other points along the Mexican border—men, women, and children. Under The Hague convention neutral powers are obligated to interne the soldiers—belligerents—that come upon their territory during war. This obligation rests on neutral powers. I do not believe anyone familiar with the conditions can honestly say that we are a neutral power in the present situation in Mexico. Notwithstanding, we have a duty to perform to these unfortunate people.

In view of our attitude toward the constitutionalists our retention of these people really amounts to an aid to the constitutionalists, because these people interned and held by us, 4,000 of them, are federal soldiers. So far as the women and children are concerned, the fact that we hold them and refuse to allow them to go back to Mexican territory, is proof positive that we ourselves have no confidence in the honor of the constitutionalist forces, and are fearful that the women and children of their own blood and nation would suffer at their hands if we allowed them to go back over the border. We have already appropriated $500,000 for the purpose of caring for these refugees. We are now proposing to appropriate $170,000 more. The question is, Are we ever to be reimbursed? The Hague convention provides for reimbursement, but our representatives at the Niagara Falls mediation conference agreed that the Government of the United States will not claim a war indemnity or other international satisfaction.

Let us assume for the sake of illustration that the so-called constitutionalists should establish themselves as a permanent government in Mexico. They would be under no obligation to reimburse us, because we have not recognized them and they are not parties to the mediation conference, and because it has not been at their request or suggestion that we have interned these people.

Again, if the government established in the City of Mexico which we recognize in the future claims to be a party to those protocols, to this understanding at Niagara Falls, then they can claim that they are absolved from responsibility for payment by paragraph B of article 2, under which we waive all claim or demand for indemnity or satisfaction.

And this is the position we find ourselves in with regard to this particular phase of the Mexican controversy: Our Government, in the interests of humanity, proceeds to care for these Federal soldiers, who would have been butchered had they been sent back across the border; when we proceed to care for these women and children, who would have suffered all manner of outrage and indignity had they gone across the border, then we meet the representatives of the Huerta government at Niagara Falls and agree that we shall make no demand on anyone represented or bound by the terms of the Niagara conference for any expenditures we have made in regard to this or any other matter.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BUTLER. With whom did we make that agreement at Niagara Falls?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, the gentleman knows who were present at the Niagara Falls mediation. There were representatives of the Huerta government, which we never recognized, and which we had been trying to overthrow for more than a year.

Mr. BUTLER. Were the constitutionalists there?

Mr. MONDELL. They were not officially represented, as I understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, all that I desire to say is that under the provisions of The Hague convention, ratified and proclaimed on February 28, 1910, to which the United States was signatory, article 11 provides—

A neutral power which receives on its territory troops belonging to the belligerent armies shall intern them, as far as possible, at a distance from the theater of war.

It may keep them in camps and even confine them in fortresses or in places set apart for this purpose.

It shall decide whether officers can be left at liberty on giving their parole not to leave the neutral territory without permission.

Article 12 provides—

In the absence of a special convention to the contrary, the neutral power shall supply the interned with the food, clothing, and relief required by humanity.

At the conclusion of peace the expenses caused by the internment shall be made good.

And article 13 provides—

A neutral power which receives escaped prisoners of war shall leave them at liberty. If it allows them to remain in its territory, it may assign them a place of residence.

These hostile troops were received on the territory of the United States. They have been interned. Accompanying the troops were a number of women and children. They are kept with the troops. They have no desire to leave them. They are a part of the army. The cooking and other things done by distinct services in our Army are done by the women in the Mexican Army. There has been no application on the part of these people to return. They do not desire to return. They are better off now than they have ever been.

The United States is performing the obligations imposed by the treaty, and there is no situation or condition that calls for any protest or criticism.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 16, after line 5, insert the following:

"The Secretary of War is authorized to accept the deed from Edward Ingersoll, conveying to the United States a tract of land containing about 1 acre, now forming part of the Springfield Armory, Springfield, Mass., the said deed having been received May 16, 1859, registered in book 198, page 153, Hampden County, State of Massachusetts, by James D. Russell, register."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

CONTINGENT, NAVY.

For contingent, Navy, including the same objects specified under this head in the naval appropriation act for the fiscal year 1914, $64,229.55.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the appropriation made in this item was made necessary by reason of our occupation of Vera Cruz, and it raises the question of why we are occupying Vera Cruz. After having signed a protocol waiving all claim for indemnity or satisfaction, why are we at Vera Cruz? Because of the incident of Tampico, said to have been an insult to our flag, we demanded a salute of 21 guns. We would not accept 16. But our representatives at the mediation conference have agreed that we are not entitled to any salute. A stiff-necked administration sent a majestic fleet across the seas under forced draft, landed marines at Vera Cruz, and sacrificed the lives of 19 brave American boys. For what? For nothing—so our representatives at Niagara Falls have said—as we are entitled to no satisfaction for the affair at Tampico, according to their admission.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] said a little while ago that he gloried in the determination of the administration not to have war with Mexico. Ah, the administration knew that the American people would not uphold any administration for a moment that would plunge us into war with Mexico. But the administration did bring on war with Mexico at Vera Cruz, at the cost of American lives and at the cost of the lives of many Mexican people. The gentleman from Tennessee says he glories in the fact that the administration declines to recognize the Federal Government at the head of which is Huerta.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. The gentleman is not talking to the amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, every time I attempt to address the House the gentleman from Connecticut insists on rising and interrupting me. I decline to be interrupted more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is pursuing the usual course.

Mr. DONOVAN. The gentleman is not speaking to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, it is very difficult to proceed with a five-minute discussion when subjected to constant interruption from Members who have no right to interrupt. I shall ask the Chair to protect the committee from the interference of the gentleman from Connecticut, who does not know what constitutes orderly debate.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] glories in the fact that the administration has not recognized the Presidency of Huerta in Mexico, because, he said, it was founded on assassination.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MONDELL. It is a good thing that the gentleman from Tennessee had admitted but a moment before that he was not well informed with regard to affairs in Mexico. Had he been well informed, he would have known that the government of Huerta was established in Mexico some four or five days prior to the assassination of President Madero.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. However that may be——

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HARRISON). The gentleman from Connecticut makes a point of order. The gentleman from Wyoming will desist. The gentleman from Connecticut will state his point of order.

Mr. DONOVAN. That the gentleman from Wyoming is not speaking to the subject matter under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I think it is high time that the gentleman from Connecticut, who does not know and does not understand what constitutes orderly debate or the amenities of the House, be informed by the Chair. I think it is the duty of the Chair to inform him. The gentleman has constantly interrupted me every time I have tried to discuss the matter before the House to-day. I realize that gentlemen on the other side do not want this matter discussed, but I assure them I shall discuss it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. How much of my time was used by the gentleman from Connecticut and my request of the Chair for protection?

The CHAIRMAN. The present occupant of the chair will state that he was not in the chair at the time, and can not give the gentleman that information.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wyoming may proceed for five minutes.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wyoming be permitted to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut objects. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

PAY, MISCELLANEOUS.

For pay, miscellaneous, including the same objects specified under this head in the naval appropriation acts for the fiscal years that follow:

For 1913, $16,619.27.

For 1912, $6,110.49.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, a discussion of these items, the necessity for which arises out of our occupation of Vera Cruz, makes in order a discussion of the facts relative to our occupation of that Mexican seaport and of the general situation to which that fact is related.

To continue my statement of a moment ago, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] evidently does not realize the fact that the Federal Government in Mexico was not founded by assassination. The present Government was established several days before the assassination of President Madero.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I did not assert that the Federal Government was based upon assassination.

Mr. DONOVAN. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. DONOVAN. That the Member from Wyoming is not talking to the subject matter of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I did not assert that the Federal Government in Mexico was based upon assassination.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Seventy-one members present; not a quorum.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken; and on division (demanded by Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee), there were—ayes 5, noes 39.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee and Mr. GILLETT.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 10, noes 72.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order of the gentleman from Connecticut that there is no quorum present is well taken. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ADAMSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having under consideration the bill H. R. 17824, the general deficiency bill, finding itself without a quorum, caused the roll to be called, whereupon 229 Members answered to their names, and he presented a list of the absentees.

The committee resumed its sitting.

The Clerk read as follows:

Equipment of vessels: For equipment of vessels, including the same objects specified under this head in the naval appropriation act for the fiscal year 1911, $19,565.47.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, when I was interrupted a short time ago in the discussion of these items made necessary by our taking and occupation of Vera Cruz, I was calling attention to some errors the gentleman from Tennessee fell into in his discussion when he would have us understand that the present Federal Government of Mexico was founded on assassination, and therefore the President was justified in not recognizing that Government. I call attention to the fact that the present Government of Mexico was established some days before the unfortunate taking off of President Madero. It is entirely proper that our Government should withhold its recognition of that Government for some time.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not talking to the paragraph for the equipment of vessels.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken, and the gentleman will confine himself to the question before the House.

Mr. MONDELL. This item is in regard to the repair of vessels used in connection with our taking of Vera Cruz. Our taking of Vera Cruz became necessary by reason of our failure to recognize the federal government.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is mistaken; the paragraph has nothing to do with that situation.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman imagines that it has not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I know what I am talking about, and the point of order is well taken.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman insists on my talking about these particular vessels——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not insist on the gentleman's speaking at all. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from New York is altogether too modest. He is always anxious to hear me talk.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is an item to supply deficiencies for the year 1911, and has nothing to do with other items which arose out of the situation with Mexico.

Mr. MONDELL. It has to do with the repairs of vessels.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; in the year 1911.

Mr. MONDELL. It opens up the entire question of the use and repair of vessels belonging to the naval establishment, and could be very properly discussed, but I do not care to take the time now, because there are a number of paragraphs to which my remarks will be in order.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF MEDICINE AND SURGERY.

Transportation of remains: For transportation of remains of officers and enlisted men, including the same objects specified under this head in the naval appropriation acts for the fiscal years that follow:

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, this appropriation is made necessary because of the unfortunate loss of life of American soldiers and sailors at Vera Cruz. That unfortunate loss of gallant American seamen was the result of our failure to recognize the Federal Government in Mexico. I was about to remark a moment ago when interrupted that it was the duty of our Government, after having waited long enough to emphasize our abhorrence of crime, of assassination, which followed the establishment of the Government of Huerta to then recognize that government.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not talking to the question. The item before us is as to the transportation of remains, and the gentleman has made no motion. There is no appropriation in this particular paragraph. The Clerk finished reading at line 11.

Mr. MONDELL. I have no objection to the Clerk reading the other line.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read line 12.

The Clerk read as follows:

For 1914, $5,000.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I was about to remark——

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, what is the gentleman talking to? He offered no amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. I thought I did offer an amendment.

Mr. RUBEY. What was the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. MONDELL. To strike out the last word.

Mr. RUBEY. The gentleman may have intended to make that amendment, but he did not.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentlemen on the other side are getting so technical that I shall endeavor to meet all of their different objections to my discussion of these matters. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and that gives me five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming moves to strike out the last word, and the gentleman is recognized.

Mr. MONDELL. If after withholding the recognition of the Federal Government of Mexico on account of the assassination of President Madero we had recognized that Government, we would have been in a position where we could have negotiated directly with the people of Mexico during all this period of time during which it has been necessary for us to indirectly communicate with them through intermediaries appointed as personal representatives of the President.

The gentleman from Tennessee I fear falls into the same error that the President has fallen into—that we recognize the head of a government. We do not do that in our dealing with a foreign power, we recognize the people of the country as represented by the government.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. And much as we may dislike the head of the government, much as we may disapprove of the method and conditions under which the government is established, it is our duty to maintain such relations with all civilized people that we may deal with them directly through the authorities they have established or they have accepted.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not talking to the question. The paragraph reads: "For 1914, $5,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. How much of my time had I consumed at the time the Chair decided I was not discussing the paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. About three minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. When an objection is made and sustained that the gentleman is not speaking to the bill, under the rules should he not take his seat?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no; Mr. Chairman, nobody has called the gentleman to order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I was observing the rules of the House. I ask to be recognized for the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Washington that the gentleman from Wyoming may be permitted to proceed in order.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I have not for a single moment been speaking out of order, and I refuse to accept any time on the theory I have not been proceeding in order.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment. I have not for a moment been speaking out of order, but I do not desire to raise that question with the Chair. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. RAKER. In a statement the gentleman made this morning he said that he was anxious——

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman will be brief in his statement.

Mr. RAKER. Yes; I will be brief—to get to this irrigation extension bill.

Mr. MONDELL. I am very anxious to get to it.

Mr. RAKER. Does the gentleman not believe that these questions of criticisms and little scoldings would be better laid aside, so that we may get through with this bill, in order that we may take up the reclamation extension bill, and really get to it, instead of talking about it? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I did not yield to the gentleman from California to read me a lecture. The gentleman from California voted to postpone the consideration of the irrigation bill two weeks ago.

Mr. RAKER. I did not.

Mr. MONDELL. He did vote to dispense with Calendar Wednesday, when the irrigation bill was the next bill for consideration. I voted against it; and I propose to discuss great national issues when they are before the House, whether it pleases my friend from California or the gentleman from Connecticut or not.

Mr. RAKER. It is not a question——

Mr. MONDELL. The day of free debate and discussion has not yet closed in the House of Representatives, much as gentlemen upon that side would like to close it.

Mr. RAKER. Would not the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. MONDELL. No; I will not, Mr. Chairman, because the gentleman does not ask me a question, but proceeds to scold me, claiming that I am delaying the consideration of another bill.

Mr. RAKER. There can not be any doubt about that.

Mr. MONDELL. When he himself has voted to delay consideration of that bill and I voted against that delay.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CANTOR. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that motion has already been made.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, the question of criticism in regard to postponing the reclamation extension bill by unanimous consent——

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not speaking to his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

MARINE CORPS.

Clothing: For noncommissioned officers, musicians, and privates authorized by law, $69,836.50.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This is an item made necessary by our military and naval operations at Vera Cruz, and the discussion of that, of course, opens up the entire Mexican question. I am not surprised that gentlemen on the other side do not care to discuss that question. In view of the fact that after the insistence of the administration upon a salute of 21 guns——

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. The administration through its representatives at Niagara Falls has now——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming will suspend until the gentleman from Connecticut can state his point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I present a point of order, a matter of personal privilege. I have the right to address this House, and I have not attempted to do so to-day that I have not been interrupted by the gentleman from Connecticut, and I insist upon the Chair preserving order and seeing that the gentleman from Connecticut retains his seat.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Connecticut is within his rights in making the point of order. Whether it is good or not is for the Chair to determine.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, he is not talking to the amendment which he made to strike out the last word appearing on line 18, page 19.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest that the gentleman from Wyoming be permitted to proceed so that the Chair may determine whether he is discussing the amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ought not to pay any attention to the vaporings of the gentleman from Connecticut, but in order to assure the Chair that I am proceeding in order——

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, the vaporings of the gentleman from Connecticut have nothing to do with the amendment that the gentleman offers. This is a farce. The gentleman is violating the order of the House and violating the rules, and has no regard to his amendment and does not intend to speak to it. I submit that good order and parliamentary practice should be observed. The gentleman had the floor, I think for half an hour, and he had the chance to say all that he wished to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Wyoming that he observe the rules in reference to discussion.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Wyoming would respectfully suggest to the Chair that he has been observing the rules, and the Chair has repeatedly said so, but in spite of that fact the Chair allows the gentleman from Connecticut to interrupt me in my discussion. I can not make a connected statement if the gentleman from Connecticut is to be allowed to interrupt me.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not know of any rule by which the gentleman from Connecticut may be excluded from making a point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. Is there not any rule of the House whereby a gentleman can be prevented from rising every 15 or 20 seconds and interrupting a speaker?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; if the speaker will observe the rules.

Mr. MONDELL. I want to know whether I am within the rules, and I will ask the Chairman whether I am?

SEVERAL MEMBERS. The regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded, and the gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I want to proceed in order, and therefore I make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask the Chair whether or not under this item, which is for clothing for noncommissioned officers and men of the Marine Corps, made necessary clearly by reason of our occupation of Vera Cruz, in the discussion of it I may not discuss the general Mexican situation, with which the matter is connected?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks, under the latitude of debate allowed in the House, the gentleman could discuss the Mexican situation under this item.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I did not understand the Chair's ruling.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Connecticut will——

Mr. SISSON. Did the Chair state the gentleman could discuss it?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the Chair has been generally fair, and the gentleman from Connecticut has been entirely unfair. He does not understand the rules of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take up the time of the House discussing this matter. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] I want to emphasize the fact that after having spent millions of money sending our great fleet to Vera Cruz, after having lost the lives of many gallant men, after having unfortunately sacrificed the lives of many Mexicans, it appears by an agreement of our representatives at Niagara Falls that we were not justified in those acts. We all know that as a matter of fact, because our representatives have signed a protocol under which we agree not to demand any satisfaction. We took Vera Cruz ostensibly because we were entitled to a salute of 21 guns. We all know perfectly well that Vera Cruz could have been taken without firing a shot or the loss of a life if we had waited a day so as to have given the Mexican commander notice of our intent, because he certainly would not have made any defense against our overwhelming forces.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Will the gentleman permit——

Mr. MONDELL. The loss of life was due to the precipitant character of our attack—no; I do not yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAGSDALE. How long has the gentleman been speaking?

The CHAIRMAN. Four minutes and a half.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. All day.

Mr. MONDELL. I have been speaking whenever I could—whenever the obstreperous gentlemen on that side of the House who do not want to hear what I have to say did not rise to interrupt me. The loss of life there was due to the precipitant character of our attack, under which it was impossible for the commanding Mexican general to inform the forces scattered over the city of his desire that they should offer no resistance. It resulted in the loss of life on the part of our men and on the part of the Mexicans. That was in order that we might keep a cargo of ammunition from landing which a few days later landed at Puerto Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this item is to supply deficiencies required to purchase clothing for the marines at Vera Cruz. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], under each of the various items of this bill to supply deficiencies arising out of that situation, has reiterated a number of threadbare criticisms of the administration in connection with the situation in Mexico. Having put his entire speech in the RECORD yesterday under general debate, he is now reinstating it on the installment plan under each of these items. The gentleman was very anxious to go ahead to-day with the reclamation-extension bill. He threatened to prevent this bill being taken up because it might interfere with the reclamation-extension bill; yet if it had not been for the futile and useless and time-wasting tactics indulged in by him to-day the reclamation bill would have been under consideration for the last hour and a half. [Applause.] That may be the way some gentlemen take to expedite the consideration of a bill——

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FITZGERALD (continuing). But whenever I favor the consideration of a bill——

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I will not yield for a parliamentary inquiry; the gentleman can not take me off my feet in that way. Whenever I favor the consideration of a bill I do everything possible to prevent time being wasted in the consideration of the one that is in its way, and the more time that is occupied to-day in the consideration of this bill——

Mr. MONDELL. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. FITZGERALD (continuing). The less time will be taken for the consideration of the reclamation extension bill, and the longer it will be delayed in its consideration and enactment, due largely to the futile, useless tactics in which the gentleman from Wyoming has indulged to-day.

Mr. MONDELL. I commend the Chairman for his attitude.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman can not do anything but state his question of order in my time; I will not permit it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. My point of order is that the gentleman is not discussing the bill [laughter] or the amendment. However, I am not making that point of order——

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman has stated his point of order. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. MONDELL. But I call attention to the difference between the latitude allowed on this side and that allowed on the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is replying to the argument of the gentleman from Wyoming in discussing the item just as closely as the gentleman from Wyoming was. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This item is to pay for the clothing which had to be purchased to put the marines in the field in Mexico. Is the gentleman opposed to it? Does the gentleman wish the marines, 5,000 of them, the largest body put in the field since perhaps the Civil War, to be put in there unclothed, unfed, unprovided for, or will he find that an additional excuse to indulge in futile criticisms of the administration; or has he the courage to indulge in a legitimate discussion of this bill by striking out the provision instead of resorting to well-known parliamentary tactics to lengthen out its consideration in order to prevent the giving of time to the consideration of another bill in which he professes to be interested? I am anxious to have this bill disposed of, and such useless, worthless, time-wasting discussion, which does nobody any good, results in criticism which does not do even the gentleman himself any good. The less of it that is indulged in the more quickly this bill will be disposed of.

I do not know whether it will be necessary to state for the seventeenth time under the next item the same criticism that has been stated 16 times in two days by the gentleman in order to expedite this bill. If it will do any good, I shall ask, after the House concludes to-night its consideration of this bill and the reclamation extension bill, that it remain in session sufficiently long to enable the gentleman to indulge in all of the criticisms he may desire to make of the administration. Or let him put them in the RECORD, because nobody will pay any attention to them whether they are uttered on the floor or simply printed in the RECORD. Legitimate criticism of the administration is proper. It is highly important in a body like this that Representatives should legitimately, properly, and honestly criticize the acts of the party in power. That is conducive to good administration. It is one of the important features of our system of government. But this picayune, partisan, nasty, time-wasting action of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is not at all comportable with the dignity of the House or in keeping with the high standing which the gentleman should maintain. I hope the House will proceed with its public duties and end this useless performance. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MONDELL. I believe, Mr. Chairman, I am entitled to five minutes to close debate on my motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has had five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. I had five minutes at the opening of the debate, and I would like to have five minutes more.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will agree not to talk any more than that, I will not object.

Mr. MONDELL. Am I not entitled to five minutes to close debate, the time not having been consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. Five minutes on a side is exhausted. Does the gentleman offer another amendment?

Mr. MONDELL. I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. DONOVAN. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. DONOVAN. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, the rules say:

A pro forma amendment to strike out the last word has long been used * * * but a Member who has occupied five minutes on a pro forma amendment may not lengthen this time by making another pro forma amendment.

[Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GOOD. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOOD. The motion to strike out the paragraph is not a pro forma amendment, is it?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is a pro forma amendment.

Mr. GOOD. A motion to strike out the paragraph? Is that the ruling of the Chair?

Mr. MONDELL. I have moved to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman from Wyoming opposed to having this paragraph in the bill?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think the Chairman has any right to ask me whether I am opposed to it or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that under the circumstances that is a pro forma amendment.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair hear me a moment on that? The ruling which the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] cited says that a gentleman can not extend his time by making another motion. Now, the gentleman from Wyoming is not doing that. He had his five minutes, and the gentleman from New York had his five minutes in answer. Now, it is commencing again. That precedent simply applies to a case where a gentleman having used five minutes immediately tries to get five minutes more by offering another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] for five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, gentlemen on the other side will not expedite the transaction of the business of the committee by scolding me or by saying ill-natured or unparliamentary things to me in connection with this bill. I started in in good faith to discuss the items in this bill, and gentlemen on the other side have in an unparliamentary way attempted to defeat my efforts to refer to matters of great public interest. The gentlemen on the Democratic side do not want the Mexican mess of their administration discussed, and it will be discussed, even though they do not like it. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] may say that nobody pays any attention to it. I do not know why that side is so disturbed about my taking a little time to discuss these matters if they are not paying any attention to them.

There are a few things in connection with this Mexican situation which I propose to emphasize if it takes all summer to do it. One of them is that we foolishly, wantonly, futilely sacrificed the lives of American marines and seamen at Vera Cruz. We have confessed it through our own agencies in the signing of the protocol in which the administration's representatives have said we did not demand, and therefore admit we were not entitled to any satisfaction for the affair at Tampico on account of which we took Vera Cruz.

As a matter of fact, like the entire Mexican policy, if one may dignify the wabble of the administration by such a name, it has been one of insincerity. We did not take Vera Cruz precipitately and without the ordinary notice that we should have given under the rules of war, because of the affair at Tampico. We did it to prevent the landing of arms, and the next week they were landed at Puerto Mexico. Our boys died in vain, and we blotted out the lives of hundreds of Mexicans in order that we might prevent the landing of munitions of war, and then a few days afterwards we threatened the constitutionalists with dire punishment if they did not allow the landing of arms at Tampico when the Antilla and the Sunbeam appeared in the offing. And as it has been with this so it has been with the whole miserable mess of the administration's attitude toward the situation in Mexico. The President appeared here and told us that we were and must remain neutral in this struggle, and everybody knows it is notorious that no moment since then has the administration been neutral in the matter. We have aided and abetted cutthroats and bandits like Villa and Zapata, and we have aided in the extension of the horrible reign of rapine in Mexico. [Applause on the Republican side.] What has happened and what may be expected to happen in Mexico as the constitutionalists, so called, advance is clearly set forth in the following clipping from the Star of this evening:

SCHOOLMASTERS MURDERED.

Killing of the director and the inspector of the school of the Christian Brothers at Zacatecas, Mexico, and the imprisonment of 11 other members of the order, all French citizens, was reported to President Wilson to-day in a telegram laid before him by Brother Clementius, a member of the order, and William H. De Lacy, former judge of the juvenile court here. The President was asked to take immediate steps to have the imprisoned men set free and to prevent threatened similar occurrences at Saltillo, Acalzinco, Mexico City, Mizcoac, Morelia, Puebla, Queretaro, and Toluca, where other schools are maintained.

It seems no one is safe from these people, and they are particularly brutal in their treatment of those whose devotion to the cause of religion and charity and instruction should appeal to their sympathies.

The Clerk read as follows:

The unexpended balance on June 30, 1914, remaining to the credit of the appropriation of $3,525.87 authorized in the deficiency appropriation act approved October 22, 1913, for the completion during the fiscal year 1914 of the examination and classification of lands within the limits of the Northern Pacific grant under the act of July 2, 1864 (13 Stats., p. 365), is continued and made available to meet the expenses pertaining to such examinations and classifications as may be incurred during the fiscal year 1915.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to extend my remarks on this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the paragraph just read. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States penitentiary, Leavenworth, Kans.: For subsistence, including the same objects specified under this head for this institution in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1914, $13.07.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] offers the following amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 24, in line 21, strike out the word "fourteen" and insert in lieu thereof the word "thirteen."

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, that is simply a mistake in the year.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF NAVIGATION.

To enable the Secretary of Commerce to employ temporarily, in addition to those now provided for by law, such other persons as may be necessary, of whom not more than two at any one time may be employed in the District of Columbia, to enforce the laws to prevent overcrowding of passenger and excursion vessels, and all necessary expenses in connection therewith, fiscal year 1915, $15,000.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MOORE. This Bureau of Navigation item, $15,000 for additional inspectors for the steamboat service, would seem to imply temporary employment only.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Heretofore the temporary employees who were employed on Saturdays, Sundays, and holidays, in keeping track of the number of persons going on excursion steamers, were paid from the appropriation for the collection of customs under the Treasury Department. The Comptroller of the Treasury has held that while customs inspectors and other employees might be detailed to this work, there was no authority to employ persons temporarily. They have expended about $15,000 each year for this purpose, and this is to enable the Department of Commerce on rush days to put on the necessary employees to check off the excursionists.

Mr. MOORE. It is incident to the summer-excursion business?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. Has any particular section of the country asked for this special service?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No. I know that about New York and Philadelphia and the Great Lakes there is a necessity for this service. Wherever there are excursion boats on navigable waters the tendency is to take on more passengers than are justified under the law.

Mr. MOORE. It is a very important provision, especially in large cities.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I suppose there are many excursionists that go down the Delaware River, where the fare is cheap, for an outing. This is to prevent overcrowding.

Mr. MOORE. Where the boats are overcrowded and without supervision?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes. This is to prevent putting on more than are allowed by the regulations of the department.

Mr. MOORE. The inspectors to be employed would be employed only for the emergency?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They are usually employed for particular days—Saturdays, Sundays, and holidays. On other days the employees of the Customs Service are adequate.

Mr. MOORE. Would that be at a per diem compensation to be fixed by the Secretary?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. So that, while there is no appropriation for these men, the Secretary has the discretion to appoint them wherever he thinks they are needed?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The appropriation for the collection of customs has been used heretofore. This is to enable them to employ additional men.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

LEGISLATIVE.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

For compensation of Members of the House of Representatives, Delegates from Territories, the Resident Commissioner from Porto Rico, and the Resident Commissioners from the Philippine Islands, $7,203.77.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman a question. Did we not appropriate enough in the regular legislative appropriation bill to cover the salaries for Members of the House?

Mr. FITZGERALD. We did; but we have had a new Member.

Mr. GOOD. To whom does the gentleman refer?

Mr. FITZGERALD. To the gentleman who was seated by the House.

Mr. GOOD. Does the gentleman refer to Mr. GILL, of Missouri?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think so.

Mr. GOOD. The item is for $7,203.77. If my recollection serves me correctly, Mr. GILL was seated about the 15th of June. That would mean that during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, Mr. GILL would be entitled to pay for 15 days. It occurred to me that $7,203.77, under an administration pledged to economy, was a rather stiff proposition.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know that it is.

Mr. GOOD. It is about $500 a day.

Mr. FITZGERALD The House has decided that this man was entitled to his seat; entitled to his seat from the 4th of March, 1913. Under the law he is entitled to be paid.

Mr. GOOD. He is entitled to his seat; but he was not here. He was engaged in other gainful occupations.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know whether he was or not.

Mr. GOOD. According to the record of this House he was.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It does not make any difference. He is entitled to be paid. The gentleman has not been here long enough, or he would recall, as I recall, when there was a continual procession of Democrats out of this House and Republicans into it; and they were paid, because when the House has decided that a man is entitled to his seat he has been paid from the time his term begins.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Not only is he entitled to the time from March 4, 1913, but if he were seated on the last day of this session, according to the precedent set by a Republican House, he is entitled to pay for the entire two years.

Mr. GOOD. But is it the policy of this administration to follow the example of those very extravagant administrations that you have been talking about from time immemorial?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; we do not hope to rival them at all; but we propose to do justice. We intend to pay a man what he is entitled to, no matter what the appropriations aggregate. We are not going to try to make a record for economy by denying to a man what he is entitled to under the law.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman speaks of what he is entitled to "under the law." Will the gentleman point me to the law that provides that a man who served in this House for only 15 days shall be paid for 365 days?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Constitution provides that the House shall determine the right of a person to a seat in the House. It determined that Mr. GILL was elected. If he was elected, his term commenced on the 4th of March, 1913. Under the law he is entitled to the compensation from the time his term commenced. If there be any way under the law of getting it, the gentleman might suggest the propriety—although I do not—of asking the Republican who was unseated to return the money which was paid to him when he was not entitled to it. But this is one of the anomolies that sometimes happen under the law. One man gets his certificate and he comes here. A contest is filed against him. I understand that in this case there was a very exhaustive hearing before the Committee on Elections, and a very voluminous record of testimony was taken. It was taken so as to protect the man occupying the seat against any injustice, to prevent his being unseated unless there was conclusive proof that he ought to be. All the time that he was here he was paid. Through frauds for which he was not personally responsible another man was prevented from actually sitting in the House; but the House has decided that he ought to have been here, that he was elected; and that being so, his term commenced the same day as the term of the gentlemen and myself. This appropriation is to pay him the same as every other Member has been paid who has been seated under the same conditions. The gentleman would not expect us to defraud this man of his salary in the hope that we might delude somebody into thinking we were trying to economize. I would not care if it broke all records that ever were made or ever could be made, I favor voting every dollar necessary to pay the legitimate obligations of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GOOD. I ask for two minutes more. The gentleman has taken practically all my time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I hope the gentleman may have two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the time of the gentleman be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. I have no objection to the provision. I only wanted to ascertain——

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman ought not to expect me to object to it.

Mr. GOOD. No; I did not expect the gentleman from New York to object, but I did expect that some economist on that side would object to these gratuities.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is no gratuity.

Mr. GOOD. There is a long list of what I have taken to be gratuities on this page.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; they are not gratuities.

Mr. GOOD. Are not the following items for expenses of contestants and contestees gratuities?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No.

Mr. GOOD. Does the law provide for them?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They are allowances for expenses adjusted under the law, certified under the law, and reported in this bill under the law.

Mr. GOOD. Certified by the Committee on Accounts; but not under any statute, are they?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certified under the statute which provides that allowances shall be paid for the expenses for these contests, to either the contestee or contestant or to both, as may be determined by the Committees on Elections, and certified by them up to the amount of $2,000 each.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman is better informed on the subject than I am, and I accept his statement.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is the statute.

Mr. GOOD. I only looked up the first item, and I can not find any statute authorizing the payment of a salary when the person was not here and was not a Member.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The House has decided that this man was elected.

Mr. GOOD. I understand that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And that his term commenced on March 4, 1913.

Mr. GOOD. I understand that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This amount of $7,203.77 is the sum necessary to supplement the balance to the credit of the Sergeant at Arms. This Member who was seated by the House draws his pay from March 4, 1913, until June 30.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I do not desire to have all of my time taken up, but I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GARNER. I do not desire to take up the gentleman's time, but I wish to suggest to him that where he finds a gratuity in the bill that is not authorized by law, all he has to do is to make a point of order, and it will go out. If the gentleman has in mind any item that is not authorized by law, all he has to do is to make a point of order. Any one man in the House can keep out a gratuity that is not authorized by law.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I shall not make any objection to this, and I shall make no motion to strike it out; but I think the time is approaching when Members will not receive compensation for services that they do not perform. The time ought to be here now when Members who are seated at the end of a session ought not to be paid for services that some one else has performed and received pay for. I make no objection to this item. I only want to call the attention of the House to the fact that it is a bad practice. It is a practive that ought to be corrected. It has been running too long already. I do not care what party instituted that practice. The party that follows it is liable to criticism, for we ought not to pay two men for one man's work.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I have always been looked upon as being economical; but it happens that this is in exact accordance with the uniform custom, so far as I am informed, from the beginning of contested-election cases under the Government. The Constitution provides that when a man is elected to Congress he is entitled to his seat. Compensation then under the Constitution is fixed by Congress. Now, when a man is elected to Congress and does not receive his certificate of election, it is not his fault or the fault of the people in his district who have elected him. It is certainly not his fault, but the fault of the House, if it does not instantly begin an investigation and seat him at the earliest date possible. If he is denied the right to take his seat, then he is simply penalized by the delay of the House, and the will of the people has been thwarted for the length of time that the other man occupies the seat, if in the judgment of the House he has not been elected by the people. So it would put us in a very anomalous position to undertake to say that a man should not have his pay when the people had elected him to Congress, and when we say he was elected to deprive him of his pay. He has been punished by being deprived of his seat, and being put to the trouble of making a long and expensive contest.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I am in accord with the action of the committee. I think they have only done their duty in this matter; but does not the gentleman think the Committee on Elections ought to be punched up in order to get them to have their hearings earlier in the session? I understand that to be the point that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] is making.

Mr. SISSON. Without offering criticism of any Committee on Elections, my personal opinion is that these matters ought to be attended to expeditiously, in the very beginning of the session, and the man who is really elected to Congress ought to have his seat at the very earliest possible moment. I think the delays in these election cases penalize not only the man who is entitled to his seat, but also penalize the Federal Treasury in having to pay two men for the time that the rightfully elected Member is delayed in getting his seat, which is wrong.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. I remember years ago a gentleman from my State, a district judge, while holding his office for four years was elected to Congress, but the Republican who ran against him was seated. The district judge contested the election, and the day before Congress adjourned they seated the district judge. Now, he received his salary of $3,000 a year as district judge during the two years, and he received the $10,000, the pay of a Member of Congress. I will ask the gentleman if he thinks that is right. I do not care what party inaugurated the plan, it seems to me there is something wrong about it.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the case cited by the gentleman from Iowa authorized Congress to pay the salary or the gentleman to draw two salaries. In most of the States they have a provision prohibiting a man from holding two offices or drawing two salaries. There happens to be no law of that kind here in reference to Federal offices. There should be. In the case mentioned by the gentleman, I think the judge ought not to have been permitted to draw two salaries. But I will state that I am not familiar with the facts in the case stated.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman knows that the law provides that a Member who is sworn in and regularly elected, if not here attending to his duties, shall not draw his salary. Why should we discriminate and give a salary to a man who has not been sworn in until a few days before Congress adjourns, when he is out at work at his regular occupation?

Mr. SISSON. I can not yield to the gentleman further. I will say to the gentleman that because Congress does wrong in not requiring a Member to remain here and attend to business, and yet pays him a salary, is no reason why we should do another wrong when we keep a man out of his seat waiting. I do not think we ought to penalize any man. It is the fault of Congress in both instances.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SISSON. I ask for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks that his time be extended one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], I want to say, voted to postpone the hearing in the election case of Gill and Dyer, and thereby delayed the case and compelled Congress to pay two salaries that much longer. He should not now complain.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I am glad that this discussion has arisen. We are told that the election of a Member constitutes a question of the highest privilege, and here we are met with the financial phase of it. We have to pay the sitting Member where the seat is contested up to the time he is unseated, and then we pay the contestant for the full period, if he is successful. In addition to this we pay his attorney fees up to $2,000, the limit allowed by law.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. For a question.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman is making a criticism; what is the law in his State in regard to contests?

Mr. MOORE. I am not criticizing this item, but rather the whole contest system.

Mr. RAKER. What is the law of the gentleman's State as to contests? Take the case of the sheriff. A man gets a certificate that he is elected to the office and it is contested, and after a month or six months he is turned out. What is the law of the gentleman's State in regard to that?

Mr. MOORE. It would go to the courts and result in an ouster, possibly. That proceeding is entirely different. It is so different that I want to make that point. Here is a body which is a law unto itself. It can do exactly as it pleases. No one Congress does what a previous Congress did, if it does not want to.

In this item we have reached the financial phase of the question. We are making allowance to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GILL] for that period of time that he was not in the House, but when Mr. Dyer was in the House. I believe that is according to precedent. I do not believe we can raise or cite any precedent against it.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. Was it the fault of the gentleman from Missouri that he was not in the House.

Mr. MOORE. It was not his fault of course. He tried to get here.

Mr. FOWLER. If he was elected by the people of his district to represent them, was not he entitled to be in the House and entitled to his salary?

Mr. MOORE. I have just indicated to the gentleman that I am not questioning the item or the payment of this money, because precedent has established the system. I am trying to get at the system. We have already paid Mr. Dyer for performing the services of a Representative, and he performed them in a faithful manner, as one duly elected and certified as elected, up to the time he was unseated. Now we are going to pay Mr. GILL, the successful contestant, for the entire period of time Mr. Dyer served the people of the district and while Mr. GILL was not a Representative. I have said that I am not finding fault with this particular appropriation to Mr. GILL, because it is true that the system of paying contestants has prevailed, and there is ample precedent for appropriation in this case; but we are in the anomalous position of paying twice for being served once.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. Which one of these men does the gentleman think is more entitled to the salary?

Mr. MOORE. In equity I would say that Mr. Dyer having served faithfully under a certificate of election and under his oath of office should be compensated for the time he served. I am not contending that Mr. GILL has not a right to be paid for what he was legally entitled to, but he did not perform the service that Mr. Dyer performed.

Mr. FOWLER. He was trying to get a chance to perform them all the time.

Mr. MOORE. That may be, but I am not raising that question.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest that the payment in these cases is for different reasons. In the one case it is a contract obligation which the successful contestant is prevented from performing through no fault of his own. Therefore, having contracted for the service at a certain time, he being ready and willing at all times to continue the service, the contract being upheld as valid, he is entitled to compensation.

The sitting Member has been paid and is permitted to retain the money on the theory of a quantum meruit, not a contract, for services rendered. He is entitled to the money he got for the services he performed. It is not a precedent that makes you pay a successful contestant; it is a fact that under the law he has a contract at a regular salary during the year. That contract is not recognized until a period subsequent to the beginning of his service; but that is through no fault of his. Therefore, he has the right in law, whatever people may think about the equity of it, to insist upon the payment of the contract that he was ready to carry out at all times.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman states very clearly what I am attempting to state, perhaps not so well. I repeat, I am not questioning this particular payment to Mr. GILL, except to point out the fact that in this instance and in all instances——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE. I am pointing out that under the system of contests that prevails we are now in the position of paying twice for services once performed. I am disposing of questions of law and equity to get at the facts. The fact is that we pay twice for one service.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think the real wrong is right in this House, in that they do not settle contests within 30 days after the House meets.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman is stating again exactly what is in my mind, and stating it succinctly and clearly. The financial phase of the question to-day is this: We are paying Mr. GILL an amount equal to that paid to Mr. Dyer. We have paid, or will have paid, twice for one service. In addition to that, in this particular case, on line 11, we are making provision for the payment of $2,000 more to Mr. GILL, I presume for attorneys' fees, and on line 12, for $2,000 to Mr. Dyer, presumably for attorneys' fees, making an additional appropriation of $4,000. That is to say, there is twice as much paid here as in the case of an ordinary Member, plus $4,000 for attorneys' fees.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Does not that expense go for the cost of procuring this record, which my recollection is consists of about 2,000 printed pages?

Mr. MOORE. That may or may not be, but on line 22 we have provision in this bill for payment to the Clerk of the House of a sum amounting to $4,264.68 for various services performed in connection with contests, so that as we face the financial situation at this particular time we are making provision not only for this duplicated payment to Mr. GILL, but we are also making provision for the payment of nearly $11,000, see line 19, for attorneys' fees in contest cases, and we are providing for the payment to the Clerk of the House of $4,264.68, making a total in these contest cases of approximately $23,000. What I want to state to the House about this system is intended in no partisan spirit whatever.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] is entirely right, and so is the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON], who conceded the same thing in answer to a question by a gentleman on his side, that these contests ought to be settled very early in the session. A contest against a sitting Member is the most annoying thing in the world to a man who is trying to act in a representative capacity. It is a great injustice to him if the contest be not tried immediately. It is a gross injustice to the people whom he represents, because they can not obtain his full and complete services as a Representative if he has to defend a contest. Have any of you ever had notice of contest served on you? Some of you have, I assume, because a number of familiar names are on this list, where provision is made for upward of $10,000 for attorneys' fees.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, at this point I ask unanimous consent that the committee rise informally to permit the Speaker to lay before the House a report from the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the committee rise informally for the purpose of permitting the Speaker to lay an enrolled bill before the House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker resumed the chair.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 300. Joint resolution to continue the provisions of a joint resolution approved June 30, 1914, entitled "Joint resolution extending appropriations for the necessary operations of the Government and of the District of Columbia under certain contingencies."

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The committee will resume its sitting.

Accordingly the committee resumed its sitting.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, the contest system as it now prevails puts a Member whose seat is contested to a great personal disadvantage and minimizes even to the smallest degree his services to the people whom he is accredited here to represent. Under this system he is subject to be called back home, no matter whether he lives in Maryland, just across the District line, or out in California, at the call of the contestant upon a simple written notice to appear before any notary public. He must appear personally or by counsel and defend against the activities of a contestant, no matter what his standing, even if he be a fee-chasing adventurer. He is practically at the mercy of such a man, if the contestant happens to be so constituted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I ask for three minutes more.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, the gentleman must know that this is a subject that should be treated of in general debate. Besides, we are all out of order. The matter before us is that on line 6, and the gentleman is talking about a matter that has not yet been read.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman may have a contest in his district some time, and he may need this information. However, if he wants to object, and the committee is so anxious to proceed to spend this $23,000 without attempting to protect the Members in the future, I withdraw my request.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 28, after line —, insert the following:

"Capitol power plant: For additional amount, including the same objects specified under this head in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1914, $2,700."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, the matter we have just been discussing in reference to this case, as suggested by the gentleman from Connecticut, has gone over to other matters, but I believe there will be no objection to five minutes' discussion of the same subject.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to object, but allow me to make an observation. Why should there be discussion of matters which should be matters of general debate? The matters offered here under the five-minute rule are for the purpose of offering amendments or approving or disapproving of the items.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. This compensation to Mr. GILL for salary is made and it is necessary and just to make it. Fairness and all sense of right require that it should be made under the conditions that prevail, but the conditions are wrong and somebody is to blame. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] suggested the real culprit, the real basis of the whole trouble is that this House does not hear these contested-election cases and dispose of them promptly. We condemn the courts of this country for their long delays, but if the courts of this country put up any such methods as this House puts up in contested elections, there would be recall of the judges, recall of judicial decisions, and other methods of reforming the judiciary would be resorted to without successful opposition.

Here we have a situation which brings about almost graft or something of that kind. I do not call it graft. I believe that Gov. Folk said that wherever you see law violated or unenforced there somebody is always standing to collect graft. All these cost allowances are not graft because they are to be authorized by law, but in this very section there is an appropriation of some $4,264 to the Clerk of this House. There is an appropriation also for fees and expenses and extra salaries. The Clerk ought not to be blamed for that, but here is what the Clerk says about it in the hearings. One of the members of the committee is interrogating:

MEMBER. How much of this $4,264.68 is for the Clerks' fees; do you know?

Mr. SOUTH. That would be $2,584.68. It is divided up there.

MEMBER. Does the Clerk have anything to pay out of that amount?

Mr. SOUTH. No, sir.

MEMBER. That is net to the Clerk?

Mr. SOUTH. That is practically net to the Clerk. This is figured on the same basis that has been observed for 18 or 19 years. In the Gill-Dyer case there were 100 pages of reproductions of signatures to poll books, etc., together with photographic work, plate engravings, etc. There was a great deal of work in it this year. I think it was more than twice the amount of work that we have had to do in any other year. There were 10 cases last year and 12 cases this year, but the work was much harder this year.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRYAN. This is the same system, he says, which was in operation in previous years where the work was not half what it was this year, and it was discovered by the committee that there was $2,584.68 of absolute net gain to the Clerk without any consideration in the world, and it was so stated by the Clerk at the time that it was allowed to him, without consideration. It is not graft, because it is to be appropriated by a committee that stands for economy in this House. It is to be appropriated by law, but I say that this kind of a condition ought to bring the blush of shame to those who have charge of legislative matters in this House, inasmuch as we permitted the House to remain disorganized, without appointing a committee, for weeks and months last year while the Democratic caucus was in session; no committees appointed, and all these kinds of charges accumulating because contests were not heard and public business neglected, and I say that the gentlemen who have charge of legislation here ought to be ashamed that there should be a condition of this kind where we all agree, as the gentleman from Kentucky stated, that there was inexcusable delay, and yet nobody takes the blame. I believe we ought to stand for economy if we are going to preach economy, and when we discover $2,500 of largess and bonus in our appropriations we ought to stand on the floor and oppose it.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MONDELL. To what point did the Clerk read?

The CHAIRMAN. To page 28, line 6.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, the gentleman from Washington has been discussing an item on page 29.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We have not reached that yet.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay South Trimble, Clerk of the House of Representatives, the amount due for services in compiling, arranging for the printer, reading proof, indexing of testimony, stenography and typewriting, supervising the work, and expenses incurred in the contested-election cases of the Sixty-third Congress (12 in number), as authorized by an act entitled "An act relating to contested elections," approved March 2, 1887, the sum of $2,584.68; and an additional sum of $1,680 to such persons as were actually engaged in the work designated by the said South Trimble and in such proportion as he may deem just for assistance rendered in the work; in all, $4,264.68.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. I do that not because I intend to make the point of order myself but because of the absence from the Chamber at the moment of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN].

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman say that I am absent from the Chamber?

Mr. MONDELL. For the moment. The gentleman was out for a moment when he was called to the telephone, and for that moment he was absent from the Chamber; and having discussed this item, I reserved this point of order in his absence in order that he may make it if he desires to do a real work of reformation. The gentleman discussed this item of $2,584.68 which is proposed to be paid to the Clerk of the House.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the paragraph and I ask for a ruling of the Chair.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman can not take me off my feet.

Mr. BRYAN. Then I withhold the point.

Mr. MONDELL. I had an idea during the discussion of the item by the gentleman from Washington that he would like to do so, possibly, but gentlemen seem to be irritated whenever I attempt to address the House this afternoon. This is a pure gratuity, there is no question about that. The gentleman from Washington suggested that it was a matter of law. The gentleman should know there is no law for a gratuity of this kind; there can not be; there is not any. I do not say that it is not following the practice which has been followed heretofore. That may be true. I doubt if it is a good practice. Here is a Democratic Congress pledged to economy and reform in matters of this sort, and yet they are slavishly following what a Republican Congress did and what a Republican Congress did with much better reason for doing it, because my understanding and my belief is that in the past the Clerk has really done some work in examining these contests other than the work done by the clerks.

In this case the amount is stated that is to be paid for the clerks, and it is also admitted that the clerks did all that was done. So that the amount that we propose to give to the Clerk of the House is a gratuity, an honorarium adding that much to his salary. There was a time when the Clerk received a smaller salary than he is receiving now. Possibly he was entitled to and should have had these sums, but we increased his salary, and should this Democratic Congress, pledged to economy, now that the Clerk's salary is larger than it was formerly, give him this very considerable gratuity when it is understood he does nothing at all for it?

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman is on the Appropriations Committee. Can he explain why we are making provision for the payment of counsel fees in certain cases that have not been settled? Contests, I am informed, are still pending in certain of the cases referred to on page 20, between lines 11 and 19.

Mr. MONDELL. No; I do not. I presume the gentleman on the other side will say that we are following precedents. Everything goes nowadays on the simple statement that they are following a Republican precedent, whether as a matter of fact they are doing so or not.

Mr. MOORE. Has it not been fairly well ascertained that these counsel fees, running up to $2,000, have been an inducement for people to bring contests?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, that is true.

Mr. MOORE. And they have encouraged a sort of contest ambulance chasing that has made it very embarrassing?

Mr. MONDELL. That is very true, and the Democratic majority is encouraging it. But I rose to discuss this particular item because the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] was worrying about it and I want him to know he could strike it out on a point of order, and because it is a clear gratuity it is subject to a point of order, and the point of order is reserved.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I sincerely hope that the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] will not encourage my colleague [Mr. BRYAN] to strike out this paragraph. It has been printed out in the State of Washington that the members of the congressional delegation from that State can live well on mileage and mucilage; that is, on their mileage and the $125 received for stationery account. Now, if that sort of stuff is being printed in the State of Washington and circulated there, that we are a tribe of cheap people, and can leave our homes and come to the city of Washington to represent the great State of Washington and while here struggle along on $1,200 or so a year, I do hope it will not fall to any of us to make living harder for those who labor long and hard as clerks for this House——

Mr. DONOVAN. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And receive, many of them, pay entirely too small for the work they perform.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled. The appropriation is authorized by law.

Mr. BRYAN. Whose point of order is that?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No point of order was made.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thought that the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] made the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Because it is in order I do not want any erroneous ruling to be made. It is not authorized by law.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE. Has a point of order been made?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands a point of order was made by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. I reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. But the point of order was reserved.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask for the regular order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak against this motion of my colleague, to strike out the last two words. That is the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] is recognized.

Mr. BRYAN. I would like, in the five minutes I have, in reference to this particular section, having heard the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], who is a member of the committee, suggest that this was out of order, and was recognized by the committee as a pure gratuity; but observing from the suggestion of the Chair that it is in order, and there is no chance of striking it out on a point of order, to ask the gentlemen of the committee over there, who are noted along certain lines for economy—for instance, when we wanted to give $1,800 to our secretaries, the gentlemen protested very vigorously—I would like to ask if the members of the committee, all of them, are approving this, and if the committee is unanimous in believing that, for some reason that does not appear of record, it is right and ought to be allowed? If they do, I am willing to yield to the importuning of my friend and colleague over here and not attempt to strike it out by a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Washington that the Chair stated that this provision was authorized by law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is not, Mr. Chairman. The wording of the provision is misleading.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will wait until the Chair has stated what his position is and what he did state. The Chair stated that the appropriation was authorized by law. The Chair based that ruling upon the following language in the bill:

To pay South Trimble, Clerk of the House of Representatives, as authorized by an act entitled "An act relating to contested elections," approved March 2, 1887, the sum of $2,584.68.

If there is no such act as that, the Chair is ready to reverse his ruling.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That act authorizes the services, not the compensation, which is different. I think it is only fair to the House to state what the situation is.

Mr. BRYAN. I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The act requires the Clerk to perform certain duties in addition to his duties as Clerk of the House. He must prepare and certify for the respective committees of the House the records which are filed with him. He does not do it alone. It requires the services of others, and he is responsible for his certificate on a comparison with the printed record that it is correct. A good many years ago—I do not know how many—the House gave to the Clerk a compensation fixed upon a method of computation then adopted as pay for his services, the responsibility imposed upon him, for the certification, and also allowed him certain sums for the payment of persons necessarily employed in connection with the work.

This matter is inserted in this bill on a certificate signed by the chairmen of the three Election Committees of the House, dated June 9, 1914, when this paragraph in the bill was sent to the Committee on Appropriations. The certificate is to the effect that the matter has been examined and the work found to have been well and efficiently executed as per statement attached, and then the statement is made that there are 12 election cases, and the compensation fixed for allowance to the Clerk was based upon the same rate as has been fixed in other years.

Whatever may be said as to whether this is the most desirable way to compensate the Clerk of the House, there is one thing to be said, and that is the practice of the House has been to make this payment, upon the theory that these additional services are rendered, and that there is a sufficient responsibility to justify the additional payment.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. Of course the gentleman knows that, with reference to these Election Committees and their work, what I am going to say will not be the last word, but two of these contested elections originated in my State, and I know that there is a lot of work and responsibility connected with the preparation of these cases. A lot of it passed through my office and over my desk, and I know that those engaged in connection with those cases do have a lot of work. I simply wanted to make that statement.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The act relative to contested-election cases, approved March 2, 1887, provides largely for the mode of procedure and imposes upon the Clerk of the House a number of very important duties in connection with these contests. From the time that act was passed it has been the custom of the House to make provision for the payment of the services rendered under that statue in accordance with a well-defined procedure.

This item has been certified by the chairmen of three committees most intimately connected with the matter, and our committee has followed in this instance what has been done invariably on all former occasions—accepted the certificate and recommended the appropriation.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I have heard what the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] said, and there are here in the House the most distinguished economists that I know of, members of the Committee on Appropriations. These gentlemen have investigated this item in the hearings. They know all about it, and they are responsible for the economies in the administration of the House. Of course, it is recognized that a good part of this amount—$4,264.68—is for compensation, but Mr. Trimble, the Clerk of the House, testified that $2,584.68 of it was pure net.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Two thousand five hundred and eighty dollars is for fees for services performed.

Mr. BRYAN. Yes; to him. After all stenographers have been paid and all clerks and employed agents paid, then there is left in the pot $2,584.68, and that is an absolute gift. I am not going to take further time of the House. I leave it, gentlemen, to you.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We are following the custom of the House for 27 years, and unless the House changes it by some specific enactment my theory is that the money ought to be paid.

Mr. BRYAN. I will say to the gentleman that when the Progressive Party comes into power they will "do up" the Democrats and the Republicans and show you what real economy is. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If that time should ever come, Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will talk a little less of his politics on the floor and speak rather in his district. This House has been wasting time for a year and a quarter.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] called attention to some questions asked by me in the subcommittee in connection with this item. I want to say that I am a member of the subcommittee that made up this bill, and the amount here fixed for fees is for services rendered by the Clerk of the House. The rate of fees was fixed by prior Congresses, and at every Congress these fees have been paid to other Clerks preceding the present incumbent. I could see no special reason why this Clerk should not be entitled to these fees. I grant you that the fees seemed to me to be very high. The questions asked by me of Mr. South, who is the deputy clerk, brought out the fact that this $2,584.68 was net.

Now, having stated this much, every Member of the House has all the information that I have, and the fact that we reported the bill from the subcommittee to the full Committee on Appropriations and that the full committee then reported it to this House indicates that we assume the responsibility for the bill. I do not know that it was necessary for anybody to call any special attention to that matter or that it was necessary to call our names in connection with it, but every Member of the House, now that the bill has been reported and is pending before the House, must understand that the responsibility rests just as heavily on his conscience and just as heavily on his economic brain as upon the members of the committee, because any Member who is opposed to this item can make a point of order, and if he does not he is as much responsible for its being in the bill as we are. The individual responsibility rests upon every Member of the House, just as it rested upon every member of this committee. We did no more than report the bill to you. It is your duty to turn it down or to approve it or to amend it, just as you see fit, and to exercise all the economy that may be in your minds or in your hearts.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman agree that he will absolutely prevent the insertion of this item in the conference report by the Senate if we strike it out here?

Mr. SISSON. I do not know that I shall be a member of the conference, but I have heretofore been on conference committees, and if the gentleman does not believe that I will stand by what this House wants done he can consult the members of conference committees that I have been on. When a Member of this House is appointed on a conference committee he ceases to represent his own individual views and represents this House in the conference, and if the House strikes out any amendment or any paragraph in this bill I shall do all in my power as a conferee, in case I am appointed a conferee, to represent the views of the House, because when I become a conferee I cease to represent my individual views and I represent the views of the House in connection with my fellow conferees; and you may be assured that not only as to this item but also as to every other item that the House puts out of this bill and which the Senate may put back, if I am a member of the conference committee, I will represent the views of this House to the best of my skill and ability.

Mr. BRYAN. I am not going to make the point. It is up to the gentlemen of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For folding speeches and pamphlets, at a rate not exceeding $1 per thousand, fiscal year 1915, $3,000.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WATKINS:
Page 29, between lines 11 and 12, insert:
To pay salary of reviser of the United States Statutes for the Committee on Revision of the Laws, as authorized and provided by House resolution No. 555, Sixty-third Congress, second session, agreed to on July 3, 1914, $4,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, on the 3d of this month the House of Representatives authorized the appointment, by the Committee on Revision of the Laws, of this employee at the fixed salary therein stated. The Committee on Revision of the Laws met and made the appointment, with the understanding that the House resolution would be carried out to all intents and purposes; but the reviser who had been employed to perform the work contemplated in that resolution was advised that he would have difficulty in procuring the payment of his salary. The leader on the minority side of the House called my attention to the fact that provision had not been made for it in this appropriation bill. In fact, I had not up to that time called the attention of the chairman of the committee to it, and it was an oversight on my part; but after the minority leader called my attention to the necessity for it I did speak casually to the chairman of the committee about it, but in his hurry he did not have an opportunity to give full consideration to it. I am not finding fault with the chairman of the committee, or with any member of the committee. It was simply an oversight on my part that as chairman of the Committee on Revision of the Laws I did not call attention to it in time, and it was left out of this bill. The fact is, I am informed, that the contingent fund of the House will not be adequate to pay the amount.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Who said it would not?

Mr. WATKINS. The gentleman who has been employed——

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is $75,000.

Mr. WATKINS. The gentleman who has been employed is the one who stated that he has received that information. Whether that be the case or not, Mr. Chairman, I wish the Members of this House to know the facts—that the employment has been made, that the employee has entered upon the discharge of his duty, and the clerk of the committee and this employee are now working constantly and propose to work regularly until they are ordered by the House of Representatives to cease the work.

The gentleman who was assigned to this position has given up another position and has begun his work with the expectation of continuing it, at least until the work can be put in such a form as will meet with the approval of the House of Representatives at its next session.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is it not a fact that by the wording of the resolution it provides that the salary shall be paid out of the contingent fund until Congress shall make an appropriation for it?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes; and it is expected that Congress will do it now, because the work may not last longer than the 4th of next March unless provision is made for it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I am not complaining about it. I am just asking if my recollection of the language of the resolution is correct.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know what the resolution is that has been adopted. The practice has been that the compensation is paid out of the contingent fund, and if the position is continued up to the time when the next legislative bill is under consideration, the position will be provided for in that bill. It is preposterous to say the contingent fund of the House is inadequate to pay the salary of this position for a few months. The contingent fund for the last fiscal year carried, all told, over $200,000. The legislative bill, which will be signed to-day or to-morrow, carries $75,000 for the contingent fund. If this place is provided for, the compensation will be paid out of that fund the same as a dozen or more employees will be provided for in that way. If the place is to be continued beyond this session of Congress, provision will be made for it in the legislative bill. To insert it in the deficiency bill makes confusion and trouble. There is no question but that the compensation will be paid. The gentleman should not press it on this bill, where it does not belong.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York make the point of order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

To reimburse the official reporters of debates $500 each and the official stenographers to committees $400 each for moneys actually and necessarily expended by them to June 30, 1914, $4,600.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I am not going to consume much time on it. The item reads as follows:

To reimburse the official reporters of debates $500 each and the official stenographers to committees $400 each for moneys actually and necessarily expended by them to June 30, 1914, $4,600.

If I understand it correctly, this $500 sought to be appropriated is money to repay the official reporters of debates in the House for money actually paid out for help?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They pay the amanuenses for transcribing their notes and some other things.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words. I believe my record in this House has been consistent in opposing the increase of salaries. For seven years I have opposed it at every opportunity and used every weapon in my possession to prevent increase of salaries. I believed I was right in it, and I believe I am right in it, but of all the men connected with the Congress who in my judgment ought to have an increase of salary, or some extra compensation, it is the official reporters of debates in this House. I know of no class of men, not even excepting ourselves, that do as much hard, laborious, soldiering work as the official reporters of debates do on this floor. I know of no work, nor do I believe any other person knows of any work, connected with the Congress of the United States that is as trying on the nerves, physically and mentally, as the work required to be done by these men. It requires an extraordinary, high-priced talent, something far beyond the experience and talent of an ordinary mechanic. They must be something far beyond the ordinary average reporter. I am informed, and reliably so, that before a reporter of these official debates is fully competent to perform this arduous service he must practically have two years' experience upon the floor of this House before he is competent to do this work.

Here is a class of men whose salary was fixed 41 years ago. During that period of time the Members' salary has been increased from $5,000 to $7,500 a year. I do not hear very many men at any time rising on the floor of the House and saying anything on behalf of this class of men; and yet, as I said a moment ago, I believe of all the employees who ought to have their salaries increased it is this class, the official reporters of debates.

Now, I have not been asked to say this. Not one reporter has mentioned it to me. I sought some information from one of them. Not one has complained to me along this line in regard to his salary.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. What is the salary?

Mr. COX. Five thousand dollars. The legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill increased the salary of many Government officials. I recall that it increased the salary of the Assistant Attorney General from $6,000 to $7,500, and yet I dare say that not an Assistant Attorney General of the United States will do the hard, strenuous, day-in-and-day-out work that these reporters have done here for us. They have been in almost continuous session since April, 1913, and, I may say, almost in continuous session since April, 1909. For 41 years, without grumbling, without kicking, day in and day out, they have served this House on the salary of $5,000 per year. I see no way to get it in here or to offer an amendment. What called it to my attention was the fact that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] appeared before the Committee on Appropriations and asked for it. I have read the hearings, and I believe the time has come when these men should have an increase of salary.

Before the President of the United States signs this bill I hope somewhere, some place, along the line they will have either a substantial increase in their salary or that some money will be paid to them for extra services.

We have already let remain in here an item of $2,500 for extra work done by the Clerk of the House. I am not kicking about that; I am not criticizing it at all; it may be, and I expect is, all right, but here are men occupying positions where no one for a moment will deny they have to deliver the goods and do deliver them well, and amidst the rumblings of these debates, in all of the cross fire that takes place, the anomalous thing, the wonderful thing to me is the few times that Members rise on the floor of the House and ask even to have their language corrected, showing their eternal accuracy. I dare say that is the best and most competent corps of stenographers in the world. Not only skilled in their line of work, but educated and scholarly, as of necessity they must be before they can do this kind of work.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. Before that is done the Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from New York to page 21, lines 6 and 7, where there seems to be a typographical error, the word "of" being printed twice.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is a typographical error, and should be corrected.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the correction will be made.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York that the committee do now rise and report the bill with amendments to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ADAMSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 17824, the general deficiency appropriation bill, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? [After a pause.] If not, the Chair will put them en grosse. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. BRODBECK, for the remainder of the week, on account of the death of a close relative.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS IN THE RECORD.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the general deficiency bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PAYMENTS UNDER RECLAMATION PROJECTS.

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent, the remainder of the day is to be taken up in the consideration of the bill S. 4628, extending the period of payment under reclamation projects, and for other purposes, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk reported the bill by title.

The SPEAKER. This is on the Union Calendar, and the House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] will take the chair.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, pending that, I will ask gentlemen on the other side if we can not agree on a time for general debate?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. What time does the gentleman propose?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. One hour on a side.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. I have had requests for much more than an hour; I should not say two hours, but an hour and a half, possibly two hours.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I suggest that gentlemen wait until to-morrow and then try to agree on a time in which to close debate. There are some of us who, while we are not entirely opposed to the bill, have some suggestions which we wish to make in an effort to improve it.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. The gentlemen would probably freely exercise that privilege under the five-minute rule.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think that we can agree on a time to close debate to-night.

Mr. MONDELL. Could not an agreement be reached as to the time for general debate?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think we can do that to-morrow and probably save time.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object to the gentleman's request, I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. DONOVAN. Does the gentleman think it is fair, in view of the fact that the leaders of the minority are absent, to take up a measure of this character?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Well, it is taking an unfair advantage——

Mr. DONOVAN. The gentleman must realize we have not a single Member here from New England, of the minority, except the gentleman from Fall River, and all these great commercial States——

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. DONOVAN. Well, the gentleman is probably down and out.

Mr. GILLETT. Well, I will not be where the gentleman will be next fall.

Mr. DONOVAN. I will suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that he get the floor in an orderly way. The gentleman should not set a bad example by being disorderly. If he can not get recognition except——

Mr. GILLETT. What right has the gentleman to the floor?

Mr. DONOVAN. I reserved the right to object.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time may be equally controlled between the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID] and myself, and that we proceed to fix no limit on general debate at the present time.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand that the gentleman from Nebraska and the gentleman from Colorado are both in favor of the bill, and I do not think we should do that, at least to-night.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Well, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. FOSTER. I think we had better go ahead without this at present.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Let me call attention to the fact we have done that very thing before, and I know that there is no desire upon this side——

Mr. FOSTER. I will state that I have no desire to delay the consideration of this bill at all, but I suggest it is hardly the thing to do to-night to agree to this, but to-morrow morning it may be possible to arrive at some arrangement satisfactory to all parties.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. I would suggest to the gentleman from Illinois and to the membership that I am not seeking anything exceptional and would not have thought of it; in fact, I did not suggest such arrangement myself, but there are plenty of precedents here that this is not an exceptional request that the gentleman from Colorado makes.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the gentleman from Colorado had better withdraw his request to-night and take it up to-morrow.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Is it not agreeable to go on to-night for an hour?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly, I have not any objection; go ahead for three hours if you like.

The SPEAKER. The thing that is objected to is to having the entire time controlled by gentlemen entirely favorable to the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That has been the custom——

The SPEAKER. Oh, no.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. You have that in respect to the bill which is now under consideration, the dam bill.

Mr. FOSTER. Nobody raised any objection to it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The gentlemen on the opposite side of the House not opposed are dividing the time.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Suppose we proceed for an hour without an agreement?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will withdraw the request.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from New Jersey rise?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, no; let us go on.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If the gentlemen can not arrive at any agreement——

The SPEAKER. They will arrive at an agreement in a minute or two.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Then I will withdraw my motion if it is likely they will arrive at an agreement. I wanted to force them to that position.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado withdraws his request, and the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 4628, and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 4628, with Mr. FLOOD of Virginia in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 4628. An act extending the period of payment under reclamation projects, and for other purposes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman, before he commences his speech, allow a question right here?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. DONOVAN. Does the gentleman, as the manager of this bill—the chairman of the committee, I assume——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Acting chairman.

Mr. DONOVAN. Is he going to allow our distinguished friend from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] to roam afield on every subject on this bill, or is he going to hold him to the text?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. In answer to the gentleman, I will say that I will endeavor——

Mr. DONOVAN. As chairman of the committee, in fairness to his associates, he ought not to oblige us to sit in our seats and listen to the dribble that we have listened to to-day.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I assure the gentleman from Connecticut that I will endeavor, as far as I can, to induce the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] to talk as closely to the bill as possible. As the acting chairman of the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands and having charge of this reclamation bill, I shall earnestly try to confine the debate to the subjects embraced in this measure, both for the purpose of saving time and to prevent the provisions of the bill from becoming involved in and complicated by outside matters.

Mr. Chairman, I am authorized and directed by the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands to call up and present this bill, S. 4628, to the House. I am not going to make a long or formal speech on the bill at this time. It is a bill that has received a very great deal of careful—in fact, exhaustive—consideration. There is no measure before this House, excepting some of the great party measures, or possibly the general appropriation bills, that has received the attention of as many people or as much consideration as this one. Furthermore, there is no bill pending in this House, I believe, of any kind that is of more importance to the West, to the 16 arid States where we have the Government reclamation projects, than this measure; and for that reason the western delegation in this House earnestly asks our friends from the East and the North and the South to be patient in the consideration of it and endeavor to put yourselves in our shoes, to a certain extent, and let us show you the very great importance of this measure to the development of our country.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. There is no doubt in the world but great consideration has been given to the question, but I notice the bill does not provide for any interest on deferred payments.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That is true.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think this bill ought to pass without such a provision?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; I think so. I think we can convince the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] before we get through that it would entirely unfair and unwise, and, in fact, that it would be contrary to the welfare of the Government itself to impose any interest charge upon the present settlers or upon the people that we hope will hereafter come in and take the lands that are not yet settled upon.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think that the Government of the United States ought to furnish money to establish irrigation plants for the development of the western country without interest and at the same time refuse to enact legislation to loan money to men who have land in other sections of the country, where crops can be raised without irrigation? That is the one question I would like to have the gentleman think about.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that in the course of the discussion of this measure, and when we reach that part of this bill, I am going to especially take that matter up in detail and endeavor to convince the gentleman from Illinois, as well as all other Members of this House, that it would be absolutely unjust and impracticable to add a provision requiring the payment of interest.

The Irrigation Committees of both the Senate and the House, in conjunction with the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Lane himself, and the officials of the Reclamation Service, have diligently and earnestly worked together on this bill for months and months. The Secretary held long and exhaustive hearings and heard the representatives from all of the 31 projects extending over the 16 Western States. There were hundreds of witnesses. The Secretary then made a trip of personal inspection of many of these projects, and the Members from those States and the members of the Irrigation Committees have held a great many conferences together and with the Secretary, and this bill is the composite result of all of that long, exhaustive, concientious work. It is no one individual's bill. Two or three Senators and four or five Representatives have at some time or other introduced bills on this subject. I have introduced two myself—H. R. 4868, on May 7, 1913, and H. R. 10073, on December 8, 1913—and many of the provisions of my bills are retained in this bill. But this is in reality a committee measure—that is, the composite result of many compromises—and while not entirely satisfactory in all its details to many of us, is the very best we can prepare and present to this Congress.

The bill has the hearty approval of President Wilson and the Secretary of the Interior, the Reclamation Service, and the entire western half of the United States. As to the necessity of this legislation and the promises that have been made to the West, let me call the attention of the House to a plank in the last Republican national platform which reads as follows:

We favor such fair and reasonable rules and regulations as will not discourage or interfere with actual bona fide homeseekers, prospectors, and miners in the acquisition of public lands under existing laws.

RECLAMATION OF LANDS.

We favor the continuance of the policy of the Government with regard to the reclamation of arid lands; and for the encouragement of the speedy settlement and improvement of such lands we favor an amendment to the law that will reasonably extend the time within which the cost of any reclamation project may be repaid by the landowners under it.

While the last Democratic national platform did not contain any plank specifically mentioning this extension to the settlers of the time of payments, I am very positively informed that such a plank was agreed upon by the resolutions committee of the Baltimore convention, and that it was only through inadvertence that is was omitted. But the last Democratic national platform, adopted at Baltimore, did contain the following provision:

We believe in the conservation and the development for the use of the people of the natural resources of the country. Our forests, our sources of water supply, our arable and our mineral lands, our navigable streams, and all the other material resources with which our country has been so lavishly endowed constitute the foundation of our national wealth. Such additional legislation as may be necessary to prevent their being wasted or absorbed by special or privileged interests should be enacted, and the policy of their conservation should be rigidly adhered to.

The public domain should be administered and disposed of with due regard to the general welfare. Reservations should be limited to the purposes which they purport to serve and not extended to include land wholly unsuited therefor. The unnecessary withdrawal from sale and settlement of enormous tracts of public land upon which tree growth never existed and can not be promoted tends only to retard development, create discontent, and bring reproach upon the policy of conservation.

The public-land laws should be administered in a spirit of the broadest liberality toward the settler exhibiting a bona fide purpose to comply therewith, to the end that the invitation of this Government to the landless should be as attractive as possible, and the plain provisions of the forest-reserve act permitting homestead entries to be made within the national forest should not be nullified by administration regulations which amount to a withdrawal of great areas of the same from settlement.

Immediate action should be taken by Congress to make available the vast and valuable coal deposits of Alaska under conditions that will be a perfect guaranty against their falling into the hands of monopolizing corporations, associations, or interests.

We rejoice in the inheritance of mineral resources unequaled in extent, variety, or value, and in the development of a mining industry unequaled in its magnitude and importance. We honor the men who, in their hazardous toil underground, daily risk their lives in extracting and preparing for our use the products of the mine, so essential to the industries, the commerce, and the comfort of the people of this country. And we pledge ourselves to the extension of the work of the Bureau of Mines in every way appropriate for national legislation with a view of safeguarding the lives of miners, lessening the waste of essential resources, and promoting the economic development of mining, which, along with agriculture, must in the future, even more than in the past, serve as the very foundation of our national prosperity and welfare and our international commerce.

And we certainly had a right to construe those planks as a guaranty of fair treatment to the West.

After his visit to many of the reclamation projects and thorough investigation, Secretary Lane, in his last annual report, says:

There is one matter of great moment to these people which should be corrected by law as soon as possible. We mistook the ability of the farmer to pay for his water rights. Ten years was the time given. His optimism and our own was too great. That time should be doubled.

And in the following letter to the chairman of the committee Secretary Lane gives his hearty approval to this bill:

FEBRUARY 28, 1914.

MY DEAR JUDGE: In answer to your inquiry, I beg to advise you that I heartily indorse your bill for the extension of time for the payment of construction charges on irrigation projects.

Cordially, yours, FRANKLIN K. LANE.

There can be no question whatever by anyone who knows anything about this subject as to the absolute necessity for this legislation at this time. The Secretary has already felt compelled by the emergency of the situation to issue an order deferring payments under these projects until the first of next month under the confident hope and belief that Congress would pass this bill before that time. This bill passed the Senate last March and has been pending on our calendar ever since, and the Members can little realize the anxiety of the West to obtain the approval of the bill before this session adjourns. The main purpose of the bill is to extend the period within which construction charges on irrigation projects must be paid by the water users. The present law requires all such charges to be paid within 10 years. This bill extends the time to 20 years. Actual experience has demonstrated beyond question that the time fixed by the present law is much too short. The settlers under these reclamation projects after years of the hardest possible work and the utmost economy have found that it is an absolute impossibility for nine out of ten of them to clear and break their land and prepare it for cultivation and make the necessary improvements and in addition thereto to make the payments to the Government of the construction charges as the law now requires. That is the reason the Secretary has been compelled to extend the time of these payments to prevent the loss and destruction of the homes and property rights of thousands of these honest, industrious, and bona fide home builders. The committees and everybody who knows anything about it knows that the time of payment should and must be extended to 20 years.

This extension is imperatively necessary, not only for the settlers themselves, but for the success of the reclamation work. The entire Reclamation Service and nearly all the 31 projects will soon be in a very serious situation if this relief is not speedily granted.

There are many reasons why this condition has come to pass. Since the passage of the original reclamation law on June 17, 1902, the cost of everything has increased. At that time and for a few years thereafter, and when these projects were being selected and started, it was generally and confidently believed that the land would be watered for from $10 or $15 to $20 per acre. And the great expense, necessary hardships, and delays of the settlers were not fully realized.

Since then there has been a general increase of construction cost, and the work has been done in a more permanent and substantial manner and upon a much larger scale than originally contemplated. The result is that instead of the water costing the farmers $15 or $20 an acre it is going to cost them from $40 to $100 per acre. And while this situation was never anticipated by the original settlers—and in many cases it is a very great hardship upon them—yet there is no thought of repudiating this obligation. All they ask is that they be given a reasonable opportunity to make this money, as they must, out of the land and pay out.

Moreover, a large part of the land under many of these projects has not yet been taken by anybody. It is still public domain. Nobody will settle upon this land unless the Government will give them a reasonably fair chance to pay for it.

It is not the wealthy but the poor people, very often men with large families, who take this land, and they have got to make a living as they go along, besides reclaiming this barren land and paying the Government.

The extension we ask for is not only a matter of necessity for the settlers; it is a matter of good business for the Government. It is nothing more than common sense and fair dealing between the Government and these thousands of settlers who have gone on these lands in the utmost good faith. This is all I care to say in the opening of this debate. I will go into the details and discuss the various provisions of this bill, as we reach them, under the five-minute rule.

The West appeals to this House on behalf of these tens of thousands of home builders, to give them an opportunity to repay the Government and save their homes.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the remainder of my one hour's time.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. I do not know of anyone. There are several Members who are anxious to speak, but I do not know of anyone who is ready to speak now.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think it is about time we get through with the day. No one seems to be anxious to go on with this bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FERGUSSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 4628) extending the period of payment under reclamation projects, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 10525. An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 13542. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 10523. An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes; and

H. J. Res. 300. Joint resolution to continue the provisions of a joint resolution approved June 30, 1914, entitled "Joint resolution extending appropriations for the necessary operations of the Government and of the District of Columbia under certain contingencies."

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, July 16, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting item of legislation to increase the limit of cost for the erection of a building or buildings on the site of the immigration station at Boston, Mass. (H. Doc. No. 1121); to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting certain information, under direction of House resolution No. 295, regarding holder of title to railroads from Atchison to Waterville, Kans., and whether the United States has commenced action to recover principal and interest due on bonds issued by the United States to the railroad company (H. Doc. No. 1122); to the Committee on Ways and Means and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting supplemental estimate of appropriation for site and commencement of post-office building at Winchester, Mass. (H. Doc. No. 1123); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. HAY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 146) to authorize the President to raise the organization of the Regular Army on certain occasions to its prescribed statutory maximum strength, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 967), which said joint resolution and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 17882) to grant the consent of Congress for the city of Lawrence, county of Essex, State of Massachusetts, to construct a bridge across the Merrimac River, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 970), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. ESCH, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 4976) permitting the Wisconsin Central Railway Co. and the Minneapolis, St. Paul & Sault Ste. Marie Railway Co., its lessee, to construct, maintain, and operate a railroad bridge across the Chippewa River at Chippewa Falls, Wis., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 971), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. KERN submitted an amendment authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to refund out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated to any trust company or other claimant taxes erroneously assessed or illegally collected under section 2 of the war-revenue act of June 13, 1898, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted an amendment proposing to enable the Secretary of Labor to carry out the provisions of Senate resolution 68, authorizing an investigation and report upon the mortality and disability by accident or by disease incident to or resulting from the various occupations in which the wage earners of the United States are engaged, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES (for Mr. CLAPP) submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $3,000 to pay the persons who compiled, annotated, and indexed volume 3, Indian Laws and Treaties, under Senate resolutions of March 3, 1907, and August 14, 1912, etc., intended to be proposed to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland submitted an amendment proposing to erect at Fort McHenry, Baltimore, Md., under the direction of the Secretary of War, a monument in memory of Francis Scott Key, author of the Star Spangled Banner, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McCUMBER submitted an amendment providing for the refund of sums paid for documentary stamps, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to enable the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay to the officers and employees of the Senate and House borne on the annual and session rolls on the 1st day of July, 1914, a sum equal to one month's pay, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. O'GORMAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

KANAWHA, GAULEY, AND NEW RIVERS, W. VA.

Mr. CHILTON. I submit a resolution which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The resolution (S. Res. 420) was read and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, instructed to investigate and to report to the Senate as soon as practical, whether or not the waters of the Great Kanawha, the Gauley, or the New Rivers, in West Virginia, are being polluted, and if so, how and by what means; also whether or not the ore washings on the New River, by which the New and Kanawha Rivers were heretofore polluted, have been stopped, and if not, why not.

Mr. CHILTON. To accompany the resolution, I submit an editorial from the Charleston Mail, of West Virginia, explanatory thereof, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RIVER POLLUTION.

For some half dozen years or more there has been an annual complaint about the pollution of the rivers, with especial reference to the Kanawha. In the case of the Kanawha this complaint, so far as Charleston is concerned, relates more to the aesthetic than to utility, as the city gets its water from the Elk—a stream that in the last few years has been the subject of very great pollution. The water we drink, however, is filtered and also chemically treated to make it pure, and tests have shown that it is pure.

However, there are persons in this valley who depend upon the waters of the Kanawha for drinking purposes, and to these persons the condition of that stream is a very serious matter. In this connection it must be said that it is extremely dangerous to drink the raw water out of any American river. All of them carry a fluid that is not fit to drink from a sanitary point of view. We make our rivers vast natural sewers, emptying into them the filth of all our cities, and then taking this filthy water and by filtering and chemical processes we attempt to restore the pristine purity with more or less success, but always with the danger that some portion will escape purification, as is sometimes the case.

In Germany, the country that has taken the lead in so many things, they do things differently. There the sewerage of the city is not turned into the streams. It is turned into vats and is made into fertilizers at a commercial profit, and thus an economic waste is prevented and the streams are kept free from a great source of contamination. The Germans, thrifty folk that they are, thus kill two birds with one stone.

We in this country have yet some things to learn; and learning them, to practice them. We should take more pride in our streams—pride in their appearance and pride in their purity. We should not only insist that other persons shall not pollute them, but we should likewise be sure that we do not dump our own filth into them. A pure looking, clear stream is not necessarily a safe stream to drink from or even to bathe in. In fact, its very clarity may be dangerous in that it leads to belief that the water is pure when it is dangerously germ laden.

PAUL M. WARBURG.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The following resolution, Senate resolution 413, comes over from a preceding day, which the Chair, in accordance with the decision heretofore made, decides to be a resolution that should be presented in executive session.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Norris	Thomas
Borah	Hollis	Perkins	Thompson
Brady	Jones	Pittman	Thornton
Bristow	Kenyon	Poindexter	Tillman
Bryan	Kern	Pomerene	Townsend
Burton	Lane	Ransdell	Vardaman
Camden	Lea, Tenn.	Shafroth	Warren
Catron	Lee, Md.	Sheppard	Weeks

Clapp	McLean	Smith, Ga.	White
Crawford	Martin, Va.	Smoot	Williams
du Pont	Martine, N. J.	Sterling	Works
Gallinger	Nelson	Stone
Gronna	Newlands	Swanson

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-four Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Chair had reached the conclusion of morning business and announced that in accordance with the decision of the Chair heretofore made Senate resolution 413 is a resolution which should be presented in the executive session of the Senate.

FEDERAL EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY LAW.

Mr. STONE. I understood the Chair to state that morning business has closed. I got in here about 5 minutes after 12. It must have been closed very soon after the Senate met.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate convened at 12.

Mr. STONE. I know it did; but it usually takes more than five minutes to go through with the routine business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It did not this morning. The statement is incorrect. The Chair did not announce that morning business had closed. The Chair had reached resolutions coming over from a preceding day.

Mr. STONE. I have a letter received this morning containing a little over two typewritten pages that I should like to have read. It is in the nature of a petition or request of Congress. I should like to have it read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

KANSAS CITY, MO., July 9, 1914.

Hon. WM. J. STONE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I take the liberty of calling your attention, in behalf of the railroad men, to the two recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States construing the Federal employers' liability act of 1908, as amended in 1910, to wit: Behrens against Illinois Central Railroad Co., decided April 27, 1914, and Horton against Seaboard Air Line Co., decided about the same time.

In the Behrens case the court held that an employee injured or killed did not have the right to bring, or his administrator bring, an action under the Federal employers' liability act, unless the employee was actually engaged in handling interstate commerce at the time of the accident. While the court reaffirmed its former decisions in holding that the act was constitutional and clearly within the powers of Congress to enact, it said, with reference to the clause "shall be liable in damages to any person suffering injury while he is employed by such carrier in such commerce" (sec. 1 of act) that "giving the words their usual meaning, as we think must be done, it is clear that Congress intended to confine its action to injuries occurring when the particular service in which the employee is engaged is a part of interstate commerce."

It is apparent from this decision that to give railroad employees the relief that Congress evidently intended by this act, section 1 thereof should be amended, the words "while he is employed by such carrier in any commerce handled by such carrier" being substituted for "while he is employed by such carrier in such commerce."

Such amendment would bring all railroad men within the provisions of the act regardless of whether they were engaged in interstate or intrastate commerce at the time of accident and would be of great benefit to railroad employees.

Sections 3 and 4 of said act deny to the railroads the defenses of contributory negligence and assumption of risk when the negligence complained of is a violation by such common carrier of any statute enacted for the safety of employees, and in the Horton case, supra, the court decided that said sections 3 and 4 only applied where the negligence was a violation of the Federal statutes.

If the act can be amended in said sections 3 and 4 thereof by adding after the word "statute" and before the word "enacted," in the proviso of said sections, the words "Federal or State," so that said sections will read: "where the violation by such common carrier of any statute, Federal or State, enacted for the safety of employees," etc., then the railroad will receive the protection that Congress has evidently intended to give them by this law, which said Horton case, supra, practically denies where the negligence causing the injury or death was a violation of a State statute.

By section 6 of the act, as amended in 1910, the State courts are given equal jurisdiction with the Federal courts. If Congress has power to do this, why can not sections 3 and 4 be amended so as to put in active operation the various State safety-appliance acts?

Thanking you in advance for any efforts made by you along the lines herein suggested for the benefit of the railroad men, I beg to remain,

Yours, very truly,

E. C. WHITESITT,
Secretary-Treasurer Missouri State Legislative Board of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen and Attorney for said Board.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The letter will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

YOSEMITE NATIONAL PARK.

Mr. WORKS. From the Committee on Public Lands I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 1694) to amend an act approved October 1, 1890, entitled "An act to set apart certain tracts of land in the State of California as forest reservations," and I submit a report (No. 671) thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from California asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill reported by him.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I ask that the bill may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to have the bill go over, as I desire to examine it closely. I may not object to its consideration finally; but it announces a principle to which I have objection, and this land is upon the public domain.

Mr. WORKS. Will the Senator allow me to explain the bill before he objects to its consideration?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly.

Mr. WORKS. There is some reason why the bill should be passed expeditiously.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I did not hear the remark of the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. Will the Senator allow me to make an explanation which I think may satisfy his mind on the subject?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. WORKS. The only effect of the bill will be to allow the Secretary of the Interior to lease a place for the construction of a hotel in the Yosemite National Park. Such a provision is already in existence as to other parks, and this only proposes to extend the right.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does the bill propose to extend it only as to one site?

Mr. WORKS. That is all.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Is it a general clause?

Mr. WORKS. There is a general statute already in existence, and this is an amendment of that statute so as to include the Yosemite National Park. It is quite desirable that there should be a hotel built there, and that it may be in operation by next year, when, it is hoped, a great many people will desire to visit the Yosemite National Park.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does this bill propose to give the right to the Secretary of the Interior to lease any land on the public domain?

Mr. WORKS. Only as to land in the Yosemite Park.

Mr. SHAFROTH. In the park itself?

Mr. WORKS. In the park itself.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, then, I withdraw my objection to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not propose to object, unless this bill leads to debate, and, if it does, I shall do so.

Mr. WORKS. I do not think the bill will lead to debate.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 1694) to amend an act approved October 1, 1890, entitled "An act to set apart certain tracts of land in the State of California as forest reservations."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EMPLOYMENT OF ASSISTANT CLERK.

Mr. BANKHEAD submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 421), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads be, and it hereby is, authorized to employ a temporary clerk, at a salary of $120 per month, the same to be paid out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided by law.

METHODIST BOOK CONCERN SOUTH.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 423), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed 3,000 additional copies of Senate Report No. 1416, Fifty-fifth Congress, second session, entitled "Methodist Book Concern South," for the use of the Senate document room.

NEW YORK, NEW HAVEN & HARTFORD RAILROAD.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the other day the Senate passed a resolution providing for printing the evidence taken before the Interstate Commerce Commission in the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad investigation. The printing clerk tells me that in the evidence there are some maps and charts, and that under the law he has no right to authorize the printing of them unless they are specifically mentioned in the resolution. Therefore I ask unanimous consent for a reconsideration of the resolution in order that it may be amended by specifically providing for the printing of illustrations.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no need of the Senator asking for a reconsideration. He can ask the unanimous consent of the Senate now that the illustrations be included in the order for printing. That is all that is necessary.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection of course to putting it in that form. I make that request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the maps, charts, and other illustrations contained in Senate Document No. 543, Sixty-third Congress, being the evidence and the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission, be printed as a part thereof. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

AFFAIRS IN MEXICO.

Mr. JAMES. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the New York World of to-day, entitled "Wilson's Triumph in Mexico"; and also an editorial taken from the New York Times, headed "Huerta's Ending."

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

WILSON'S TRIUMPH IN MEXICO.

The President's Mexican policy, concerning which there have been many misgivings, has triumphed. The dictator has resigned. A constitutional government is to be established. There will eventually be peace at home and peace with the United States.

When Gen. Huerta, on the 18th of February, 1913, telegraphed to President Taft: "I have overthrown this Government and the forces are with me," he had no thought of the man who in two weeks was to be President of the United States or of the forces that that man would array against the Mexican usurpation.

One week after Mr. Wilson's inauguration he gave due warning to Gen. Huerta and all other Latin-American chieftains who gain office by intrigue and assassination when he said: "We can have no sympathy with those who seize the power of government to advance their own personal interests and ambitions." Huerta laughed at this avowal, and not a few citizens of the United States pronounced it visionary and fantastic.

Yet the new American doctrine that usurpation is not to be recognized in this hemisphere has been established in the one country where its success seemed most doubtful. Against Huerta's airy assumption Wilson arrayed adamantine conscience. In opposition to the tyrant's armed forces Wilson marshaled the forces of liberty and justice.

It has taken some hard fighting in Mexico to overthrow the man who overthrew the Government, but moral courage of a higher order has been needed to enable the administration at Washington to hold true to its principles. The triumph is ours as well as Mexico's. The honor of victories won in the realm of morals is no less than that of battles gained on bloody fields.

Thanks to Woodrow Wilson, a great country and an oppressed people are upon the threshold of a new epoch.

HUERTA'S ENDING.

President Huerta has resigned, his resignation is accepted by the deputies, and Francisco Carbajal rules as provisional president in Mexico City. The revolutionary leader, Villa, assumes that, with the doffing of the presidency, Huerta will again put on the general and will take the field. But the Mexican revolution has been won—not in the riven republic, but at Niagara Falls, at Washington.

Woodrow Wilson is the restorer of peace in Mexico, not by invoking the horrors of war, but by virtue of reason among nations. Whether the fallen dictator now leaves the country or remains to die fighting or a captive is of little moment in Mexican history. President Carbajal is a man of peace, who would offer little resistance to the forces of Carranza. Powers are now in being in Mexico which, we believe, will effectually prevent a long military occupation of the capital.

PROPOSED TRUST LEGISLATION.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that to-morrow, immediately after the close of routine morning business, with the permission of the Senate, I shall submit some remarks on trust legislation.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 17824. An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1913 and for prior years, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

AFFAIRS IN MEXICO.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I ask to have laid before the Senate resolution No. 419, which went over on yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will lay the resolution down in the order in which it came over. There is a preceding resolution. The Chair lays before the Senate resolution No. 415, coming over from a preceding day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 415) submitted by Mr. SMITH of Michigan on the 13th instant, as follows:

Whereas the publication of certain correspondence has been made the basis of allegations in many newspapers that certain persons owing allegiance to and domiciled in the United States have been engaged in correspondence with the authorities of the so-called constitutionalist government of Mexico for the purpose of thwarting the designs of the United States Government and for the promotion of their own interests; and

Whereas in certain of this correspondence agents of the President of the United States have been represented as affording advice to the agents of the said rebellion against the Government of Mexico, intended to enable said revolutionists to evade the orders of the President of the United States against the shipment of arms and munitions of war into Mexico: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations or a subcommittee thereof is hereby authorized and directed to inquire, investigate, ascertain, and report whether any person, associations, or corporations domiciled in or owing allegiance to the United States have heretofore been or are now engaged in correspondence with those in rebellion against the Government of Mexico and in violation of the laws of the United States, or whether any persons, associations, or corporations have heretofore been or are now engaged in financing, encouraging, or inciting civil strife in Mexico for the promotion of their own interests or for any other reasons, and whether any agents of the President of the United States have been heretofore or are now engaged in giving advice to those in rebellion against the Government of Mexico to enable or lead such agents or authorities to constructively evade the orders of the President of the United States against the shipment of arms or munitions of war into Mexico, or whether any agents of the Government of the United States may be in any way personally or financially interested for their own gain or profit in the regrettable strife in Mexico.

Resolved further, That said committee or a subcommittee thereof is hereby empowered to summon witnesses, to send for persons or papers, to administer oaths, and to take and secure whatever testimony and evidence that may be required to ascertain and report upon the matters aforesaid; and said committee or a subcommittee thereof is hereby authorized for the purpose aforesaid to sit wherever necessary and act as well when Congress is not in session as when in session.

Resolved further, That the said committee is hereby directed to report the result of said investigation and inquiry to the Senate during the first month of the next session of Congress; and the expenses incurred by such investigation and inquiry shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to inquire if the Chair did not announce some time back that morning business had closed and if we have not been proceeding by unanimous consent?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair had no authority so to announce. These resolutions came over from a preceding day and are now being laid before the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understood the Chair at one time to announce that morning business had closed. I evidently misunderstood the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair revised the statement upon examining the calendar at the desk and finding that resolutions had come over from a preceding day.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is not here, and I have been unable to find him. I should like to have the resolution which has just been read go over until to-morrow morning without prejudice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the resolution goes over. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 419) submitted by Mr. POINDEXTER on yesterday, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy is requested to inform the Senate as to the truth or falsity of the press report sent out from Vera Cruz, Mexico, June 17, 1914, and published in the United States, that an ensign in the United States Navy caused to be shot unarmed Mexican prisoners under the so-called Mexican "ley de fuga"; and to inform the Senate of all the circumstances relating to said act if it occurred.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I ask to have the resolution go over. I have not had an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I can explain the resolution to the Senator from Missouri, I think, in a moment. It is not a matter which is at all complicated, and its terms are so expressed that nothing could be gained by any further investigation. The resolution simply asks for a report from the Secretary of the Navy as to the truth or falsity of a charge that was made by a newspaper correspondent, which has been published very generally in this country, that an ensign in the Navy, who had a squad of men under his command and had captured some prisoners during the occupation of Vera Cruz, applied the so-called Mexican system of execution, the law of flight, or "ley de fuga." That question having been raised in the country, it is in the interest of the ensign, of the Navy, and of everybody else that there should be an opportunity given to ascertain the facts and for the Navy Department to state what the facts are. I think the Secretary of the Navy would probably welcome the occasion for stating the facts, which would be given him by the passage of this resolution.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I did not see the article published to which the Senator refers, and I have not heard of it. Do I understand that it was printed in some paper in this country that an American officer, under some pretense or excuse of flight by prisoners, had them shot?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; that report was sent out by a newspaper correspondent in some detail.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, if that is all there is to it, I think it entirely proper that the department should be given an opportunity to report the facts to the Senate.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is the purpose of the resolution.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Washington, if such a charge has been made and published and such a charge is untrue, why is it necessary for the Navy Department to get authority from the Congress of the United States to deny the charge? Can not the Secretary of the Navy deny it or give an explanation of it without being required to do so by Congress?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Undoubtedly he has the power to issue a statement, not to the Senate, however, or to Congress. I suppose he could give a statement to the press to be published.

Mr. McCUMBER. He could give a statement to the public, could he not?

Mr. POINDEXTER. He has not seen fit to do so, and I do not know that the matter has been called to his attention.

Mr. McCUMBER. The thing that surprises me is that, if there is such a charge and it is without foundation, the Secretary of the Navy does not of his own volition give a denial of that charge to the press.

Mr. STONE. More than that, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, if such a charge has been made and there is foundation for it, it would be surprising that the Secretary of the Navy had not taken some very drastic action with regard to it, not only to let the country know the facts, but at the same time to punish any man who was guilty.

Mr. McCUMBER. I would naturally suppose so.

Mr. STONE. I can not, therefore, believe, Mr. President, that there is any substantial foundation for this publication. I am inclined to think that we are dignifying a sensational penny-a-liner's article in some sensational newspaper. Nevertheless, if the Senator from Washington deems it of sufficient gravity and importance to call the attention of the Senate and of the department to it, I can not see that there is any objection to having the report made for which he calls.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

CAPT. JOHN H. GIBBONS, UNITED STATES NAVY.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is closed.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I thought I addressed the Chair before the announcement of the conclusion of morning business was made; but, if the Senator from North Carolina will permit me, I simply desire to have read into the RECORD an editorial from the Public Ledger, of Philadelphia, of Wednesday, July 15, upon the naval service of Capt. John H. Gibbons. It is very brief, and if the Senator will permit me to have it read, I will be very glad.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have no objection to the Senator having it printed in the RECORD, but I hope he will not insist upon having it read at this time.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Very well, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the editorial will be printed in the RECORD.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

THE CASE OF CAPT. GIBBONS.

Capt. John H. Gibbons has won the highest honors which his profession has to give an officer of his rank. He has been naval attaché at London, commander during two administrations of the presidential yacht Dolphin, and Superintendent of the Naval Academy. Each of two ships which he has commanded won the gunnery trophy as first in the fleet in marksmanship. During the hurricane years ago in the harbor of Apia, Samoa, when two-thirds of our squadron there were wrecked, Gibbons, then a young lieutenant, led his men up the weather shrouds of the Vandalia to form a human sail. He has served ably and with honor in all our wars since then—in Cuba, the Philippines, in China, and off the Mexican coast, commanding a force of 3,000 seamen on shore at Vera Cruz. And yet this gallant and distinguished officer, when he returned as captain of the dreadnaught Utah from months of enervating duty in these southern waters, was abruptly notified by telegram that the plucking board had marked him for retirement; that his country had no more active duty for the man who had served with such ability and devotion for 35 years.

This sort of thing is simply brutal; it is an arrant mockery of the "square deal." Except to make a vacancy, there was apparently no reason for it, since the Secretary of the Navy has publicly exonerated all of the officers thus compulsorily retired this year from any defects in habit, temperament, or professional qualifications. He adds, too, and truly: "The present method (plucking) is too cruel. The retirements to-day are tragedies."

This matter should not be allowed to rest here. Neither the Navy nor the Nation can afford to wrong such men as Capt. Gibbons. Congress should at once repeal the "plucking" provision of the personnel law; and the legislation should be retroactive, so that officers such as Gibbons, Potts, Rust, and others who, with a clear record, were thus forcibly retired may be returned to their old place on the active list. These officers, like those promoted for gallantry in action, can then be carried as "extra numbers" in their grade without interfering with the flow of promotion. If, when justice is thus done, elimination is found to be necessary to obtain promotional flow, let the Navy Department find some more "human and humane" method than the present barbarous system.

ADDRESS BY THE COMMISSIONER OF PENSIONS.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address by the Commissioner of Pensions, Mr. Saltzgaber, to the employees of the Pension Office, and commended as a high-minded and worthy expression of a bureau chief to his employees.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The address referred to is as follows:

AN ADDRESS BY THE COMMISSIONER OF PENSIONS.

To the employees of the Pension Bureau:

The necessity for a reduction in the number of employees in the bureau has caused the officials much regret. Our noble and kind-hearted Secretary of the Interior enjoined upon us that in effecting reductions and removals we should be guided by considerations of efficiency and humanity. These cardinal principles we have endeavored to follow, but we were well aware that there could be no exact measurement of comparative justice in making selections from the nearly 1,400 employees of the bureau. We have done the best we could. The task has been laborious, continuous, and disheartening, but our labors were made easier by manifestations of the loyalty and forbearance of the employees themselves.

The painful experience through which we have just passed should impress on our minds very seriously and forcibly at this time a few important lessons. One is that we have no certain tenure of employment; the Government is under no moral or legal obligation to keep us on the pay roll when it has no work for us to do.

Each has his own ideas about retirement laws and civil-service pensions, but these are subjects wholly within the province of and to be determined by the Congress. We can only deal now with the situation as it is. Other lessons are that the work of the Pension Bureau is diminishing; that the number of old soldiers and their widows is decreasing rapidly; that the act of May 11, 1912, as amended by the act of March 4, 1913, has greatly curtailed the work to be done in their behalf; that the force now in the bureau must soon be still further largely reduced. We should prepare now to be ready.

Now, this is to notify you that changes may be expected at the end of this fiscal year; circumstances will imperatively require them. Therefore you should make such arrangements in the Government service or elsewhere as will best promote your own welfare. Frugality is commended; lay aside something for the day of need. Transfers to other branches of the public service will be encouraged.

Let us remember that our rating depends upon our own qualities. Nature deals more generously with some than others but all can overcome handicaps by continued effort. Let us continue true to our high ideals; let us aim to do a little better this year than ever before, and thus continue to deserve the high praise that is now given to the employees of this bureau. Let us appropriate and apply the precepts of President Wilson and regard service as an opportunity.

For your loyalty and kindness all have my heartfelt thanks.

G. M. SALTZGABER, Commissioner.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the river and harbor appropriation bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am not going to delay action on the request of the Senator from North Carolina, but I should like to say that before a great while I desire an executive session. I shall not insist on it now; but I shall undertake in the course of an hour or two to get it. I want some little matters which are in executive session disposed of, and, while I will not interfere just at this time, I will later.

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope the Senator will not ask for an executive session until after 2 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the bill commonly known as the river and harbor bill be laid before the Senate. Is there any objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13811) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I do not wish to monopolize the time on this bill, and if the Senator from North Carolina or if any Senator on the other side would like to proceed at this time, I will be glad to waive my right to address the Senate. Other things being equal, I should like to proceed with my remarks, as they are intended to constitute a consecutive and a logical development of the whole subject.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know of any Senator on this side who desires to speak until after the Senator from Ohio has concluded his remarks.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I am satisfied that if the people understood the nature of the pending river and harbor bill, it would not be enacted into law. I am equally well satisfied that if the Members of the Senate understood this measure, it would not pass this body. One reason—indeed, I may say the main reason—why several recent river and harbor bills have been enacted, notwithstanding severe criticisms visited upon them, is the lack of facts, the absence of properly arranged statistics upon this subject, and it is to that point that I wish to address my remarks this morning, at the same time making some further suggestions relating to the deficiencies of our system and to the reforms which should be adopted.

If anyone will undertake the nerve-racking task of seeking to ascertain definite tendencies and generalizations from the statistics which are available, he will find that he must labor under the very greatest difficulty, although there are figures sufficient to show certain tendencies, such as the decrease of river traffic, save in exceptional instances easily understood, and also the decrease of the average haul.

What are the defects in the present system of gathering the facts and collating statistics relating to our river and harbor system? In order that the measure may be intelligently framed and made a real benefit to the country it is necessary that we shall have a full understanding of the results and tendencies of existing river and harbor improvements and the results likely to be achieved from proposed river and harbor impovements as well.

The first objection to the statistics which we now have is their lack of uniformity. Some of the figures given with relation to tonnage and the nature of the traffic pertain to the fiscal year ending June 30, while others relate to the calendar year ending December 31. I suppose the main reason for this discrepancy is that in many instances the figures published in the reports are furnished by boards of trade and commercial organizations, and it is more convenient for them to furnish tables for the calendar year, while on the other hand statistics taken immediately by the officers of the Engineer Corps conform to the general rule relating to the financial operations of the Government, under which the year is held to close on June 30. This creates confusion, but it is not the most serious instance of lack of uniformity. In the classification of commodities different classes of traffic on different rivers and in different years are not uniformly stated or sufficiently analyzed.

In its report of 1910 the National Waterways Commission pointed out the defects in this regard in the following words. I begin to read on page 73:

> In the course of their investigations the members of the commission have observed the lack of comprehensive statistical information upon inland waterway traffic.
>
> And for the most part I shall direct my attention to inland waterway traffic pertaining to rivers and canals.
> In some localities, as at the locks at Sault Ste. Marie, detailed statements are carefully prepared under the direction of the Army Corps of Engineers, giving the quantity and quality of the freight and the number of passengers carried through the locks. Other reports made by the Corps of Engineers afford valuable information, though in some instances incomplete.
>
> Available statistics are furnished by several different bureaus of the Government, but are strikingly lacking in uniformity and in sufficient classification as well. The terms "general merchandise," "miscellaneous merchandise," "unclassified freight," and "package and packet freight" are used in the same general sense, though quite ambiguously as to what categories of freight are included.
>
> It is recommended as desirable that a uniform system be established applicable to all waterways under which statistics may be collected, showing the volume and different kinds of traffic carried on the rivers and inland channels of the country. This will not only be valuable in affording suggestions as to the extent to which waterway traffic is increasing or diminishing, and thus assist in determining the legislative policy to be pursued, but will also afford information of very considerable service to the commercial interests of the country. It is to be noted that we are far behind several countries of Europe in the accuracy of statistics relating to inland navigation. It is desirable that the statistics should show not merely the number of tons carried and the money value of the same but the distances over which commodities are transported, so that not only the number of tons carried may be ascertained but the ton mileage as well. In many respects statistics of the latter are more valuable than of the former. In some instances ferry traffic which is carried a half mile or less is placed upon the same footing with traffic carried a thousand miles or more.
> It is a question of detail for Congress to consider what agency shall be intrusted with the collection of these statistics. It is thought that the necessary information can be obtained by the expenditure of a comparatively trivial sum of money, and the duty may be imposed upon existing bureaus and officials, such as the Army Engineer Corps, the collector of customs, where the navigable channels are near to customhouses, and those engaged in the Steamboat-Inspection Service. Rules requiring masters or owners of boats to report the quantity of freight and the distance it is carried should be enforced.

We already have statutes on this subject. Under a statutory provision adopted nearly 50 years ago the masters of boats are required to report the quantity of freight they carry, as well as the distance. Furthermore, in pursuance of this recommendation of the Waterways Commission, a clause was inserted in the river and harbor act of 1910 requesting the report of ton-mileage as well as of the total number of tons of traffic; and in a limited number of instances—perhaps some fifteen or twenty—that request has been complied with.

I stated a few days ago, and I repeat it to-day, that the statistics of ton-mileage throw a flood of light on the condition of our river traffic. Formerly when a report stated that a river or canal carried a certain number of tons of freight it has been the general understanding that that freight was carried for the whole stretch of the river, or for the greater share of it. For instance, it would be presumed that freight carried on the lower Mississippi was to be carried from Cairo to New Orleans. These statistics show, however, that on streams of considerable size and length the average haul is less than 100 or even less than 50 miles; in some instances it is less than 20 miles. The inference from this is plain that, save in the case of special commodities, the river is no longer used on any extensive scale for the carriage of traffic; that commodities are picked up at landings or in the smaller cities and carried to the nearest railway crossings. This is especially noticeable on the upper Mississippi River, extending from St. Paul to the mouth of the Missouri, where, with a length of 658 miles and a tonnage of 1,830,000 tons, the average haul is only 31.6 miles.

These classifications of traffic, to return to that subject, should be made uniform by general order; and again the classification should be as minute as possible. Generally speaking, the articles designated as "merchandise," "miscellaneous freight," and "package freight" all refer to a class of commodities which are being carried in diminishing amounts upon the rivers. The railroads have absorbed most of this traffic. It is especially desirable, however, that there should not be one rule on the Missouri and another rule on the upper Mississippi; that the traffic passing along the Ohio should be classified in the same manner as that passing along the Hudson; in brief, that there should be one general classification which everyone making any report should sedulously adopt and follow.

Again, Mr. President, there should be a uniform rule governing the reports of ferriage freight. It is perfectly clear that a ferry, generally speaking, is a substitute for a bridge, and as the country develops it is often followed by the construction of a bridge. But if we look through these statistics, what do we find? In some years of the last decade on the upper Mississippi, say, between Davenport and Rock Island, or Davenport and Moline, ferriage traffic was included as a part of the tonnage carried on the river and placed on just the same footing as if it had been carried from St. Paul all the way to St. Louis. On the portion of the lower Mississippi from St. Louis to the mouth of the river ferriage traffic is omitted, or, rather, it is reported separately. It does not figure as a part of the alleged traffic of the river.

So here we see on one stream different rules prevail in the reports made on different sections. On the Ohio River ferriage traffic is included. In the report for the last year for which statistics are available—from April 1 to December 31, 1912—the total traffic of the stream, given as 8,316,369 tons, included 1,619,621 tons of ferriage traffic. In the harbor of Philadelphia, with enormous traffic, there is included 4,000,000 tons carried across from Philadelphia to Camden. In the tonnage of the harbor of New York ferriage traffic is included.

I do not think I need to further argue, first, in favor of the rule of uniformity, and second, that this ferriage traffic should be separately stated. Certainly it is very different from over-sea traffic in New York Harbor, and clearly the same distinction would exist between commodities carried across from St. Louis to East St. Louis and traffic carried down the river from St. Louis to Memphis or any other point down the river which involves a haul of hundreds of miles.

Moreover, there is no uniformity in these statistics as regards stretches of a river. In some cases the traffic is given for the river as an entirety and in other cases it is given by sections, which necessarily involves much duplication. Perhaps the best illustration of this, again, is to be found upon the Ohio River. On this stream, in a distance of a little less than 1,000 miles, 54 locks are projected. The traffic is classified according to the tonnage passing Locks 1, 8, 18, 26, 37, and 41. There are certain modifications which, I am frank to say, I am not able to fully understand from an examination of the figures. On page 2541 the last report of the Chief of Engineers states:

> In order to facilitate the collection of commercial statistics vessels operating on the Ohio River are required to make a report of tonnage and passengers carried each time they pass one of the following locks and dams: Nos. 1, 8, 18, 26, 37, and 41.
>
> Special blanks, printed with a penalty stamp, are furnished each vessel, and by proper folding they can be addressed and sent to the proper lockmaster.
>
> Steamboats operating in pools between movable dams or not passing one of the above-named locks make report at the close of each month.
>
> Boats with through coal tows or through packet boats make a report at only the first lock through which they pass.
>
> Ferries report direct to this office monthly.
> Reports of traffic are required, at the close of each month, of lockmasters of all locks and dams now in operation.

Presumably, on that basis, coal destined from Pittsburgh to New Orleans would be reported only at Lock No. 1, while the figures on such shipments would be omitted at Locks 8, 18, 26, 37, and 41; but as I read the reports, the amount is apparently included at Lock 41, which seems to violate the general rules laid down. This constitutes a serious defect in the manner of preparing statistics. But there is another defect more serious still in the figures relating to the traffic on the Ohio River.

Whenever it is necessary for a boat or a tow to pass the location of a lock and dam, whether it passes through the lock or through the open river depends upon the stage of water. Each dam is movable, and when there is a sufficient stage of water the dam is put down flat on the bottom of the river and preferably the boat goes through the open, natural stream; but if the water is low the dam is put up, a pool is formed, and the boat goes through the lock. Now, in the statistics reported there is no distinction between traffic passing through the lock and traffic passing through the open river. Yet the difference between them is of the very greatest importance. Indeed, the most essential figures required relate to the use made of those locks, and the proportion of the traffic relatively aided by the locks in passing and that not aided and which is able to go through the open river. I have regarded this as a subject of enough importance to frame an amendment with reference to it, and perhaps in the course of this discussion other amendments will be offered for the purpose of securing more accurate statistics.

Another illustration of the stretches of a river is furnished by the Mississippi from St. Louis to New Orleans. This portion is divided into four sections—from St. Louis to Cairo, from Cairo to Memphis, from Memphis to Vicksburg, and from Vicksburg to New Orleans. The traffic is given separately by these sections, and it is absolutely impossible to tell from the general figures what portion is through traffic and what portion of it is local. The Board of Engineers chosen to examine into the proposed project for a 14-foot waterway made a report on the traffic for 1907, in which they sought to show approximately what was through traffic and what was local traffic. It is found on page 344 of the document containing their report, and at a later time I shall make reference to it.

Presumably there are very considerable duplications, for a portion of the traffic proceeding from St. Louis to Cairo and reported as of that stretch also passes over the stretch from Cairo to Memphis, and then perhaps on from Memphis to Vicksburg and from Vicksburg to New Orleans; but none of the statistics with which we are furnished annually will give us any light upon this subject.

I do not think I need to argue that in order to judge of the extent of traffic on that river it is absolutely necessary that we should know how much it is through traffic and how much of it is local. We should not only be furnished with the tons of traffic which are handled in different sections of the river, but the ton mileage as well, so that we may know what the tendencies really are.

I may add that on most rivers, such as the Hudson, the Red, and the Arkansas, and most shorter streams, the traffic is given in its entirety for the whole river.

I may say in this connection that there is a notable tendency toward shorter hauls on all our rivers. By that, of course, I do not mean to include such traffic as that through the St. Marys River and on the Great Lakes. The traffic carried through the Soo Canal has for many years been conveyed by boats an average distance of between 800 and 900 miles, while on many inland streams the average length of haul has fallen to a mere fraction of what it was formerly.

I call attention to certain points.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield to me for the purpose of making a motion at this time?

Mr. BURTON. As far as I am concerned personally, I am certainly willing to yield.

VOLUNTEER OFFICERS' RETIRED LIST.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I realize that a measure which has been on the calendar for a long time is entitled to consideration, as it seems to me, and I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 392, Order of Business 209, being what is known as a bill creating a volunteer officers' retired list.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the following bill.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 392) to create in the War Department and Navy Department, respectively, a roll designated as "the Civil War volunteer officers' retired list," to authorize placing thereon with retired pay certain surviving officers who served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States in the Civil War, and for other purposes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Do I understand that this is a request for unanimous consent or a motion to proceed to the consideration with a view to supplanting the river and harbor bill?

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is the idea.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a motion. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask——

Mr. TOWNSEND. The motion is not debatable, I understand.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Upon that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CATRON (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], who is absent on account of sickness in his family, and vote "yea."

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], who is necessarily absent. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WEEKS. My colleague [Mr. LODGE] has a general pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea" on this question.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I transferred my pair to the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN].

Mr. GRONNA (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire if the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] has voted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

So the Senate refused to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 392.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I am very sorry the motion we have just voted upon has been decided as it has been decided, and by what appears to have been a party vote. I do not think it was generally understood by the friends of the measure that it had no support on the other side of this Chamber, and I am not now convinced that it has none. I am not sure that some Senators may not have voted against my motion with the idea that it was supplanting——

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will yield a moment, I think he ought to modify his statement a little. It was not entirely a party vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I did not know that. I am glad I was mistaken.

Mr. NORRIS. I remember hearing at least one Senator on the other side, my colleague, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], voting "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am very glad of the exception. I will not at this time criticize Senators too severely. I was going to say that it is possible there are Senators on the other side who are friendly to this measure, but who feel that it ought not to supplant the appropriation bill now before the Senate. I have recognized that feeling and have tried to accommodate the measure to the reasonable convenience of Senators. I have been waiting day after day and week after week in the hope that a time would arrive when the Senate would consent to the consideration of this measure.

I am convinced that the appropriation bill now before the Senate is going to be pending here for a great many days. It has dragged its weary way for weeks through this body, and no possible harm could come to its consideration if it were temporarily laid aside. The bill which I presented is one which could be disposed of in a very short time, and, as I have stated on the floor before, if it is ever to be acted upon favorably to the beneficiaries of the measure, that disposition should be made now; at least, it ought to be brought before the Senate, so that its merits could be discussed. I have such confidence in its merits and justice that I feel sure that an understanding of it would insure it support. I regret that I could not have got it up this morning, because I believe that between this hour and 2 o'clock we could have disposed of it, and it would have settled a question of vital and immediate importance.

I desire to state, however, Mr. President, that the matter is not going to end here. Every possible excuse for not considering it now, which is offered by those who would support it at another time, is going to be met, if it is possible to do so. The junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], and myself have tried hard and often to secure consideration of this bill. We have been unable to receive recognition when no other matter was before the Senate. We are not, however, entirely discouraged. The justice of this cause should be irresistible. If time was not of the very essence of our cause, I could wait the inevitable success which must come with understanding. But every day of delay means irreparable worry to the men entitled to its benefits. It must at least be brought before the Senate for consideration on the merits.

The Volunteer officers of the Civil War are dying fast. Two thousand of them passed away within the last year. They are past 77 years of age on the average. Holding the views I do, it seems to me that it is absolutely criminal for the Senate to neglect longer what I regard as a plain duty in order that the Senate may continue the consideration of the river and harbor bill, which some Senators who voted against this measure have characterized as a pork-barrel bill, a bill for distributing doubtful, local benefits. You have voted to continue the consideration of such a bill in preference to one which is but a belated recognition of the Nation's duty to men who organized, trained, and led the forces which preserved our Nation and made it possible to have a Government which could make appropriations for internal improvements.

To me it is little less than criminal on the part of the Senate to put this measure aside in the face of the fact that it possibly can not be reached during the present session of Congress, because there will always be the same excuse presented that something of an apparently more pressing nature requires the attention of Congress. In an hour we could have performed an act of justice that would have brought sunshine into the lives of 14,000 old men who deserve more from the hands of the Government than it can ever pay. The last hours of those who will pass away to-night and to-morrow would have been made a little brighter, even though no material benefits would have reached them.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. I simply wanted to suggest to the Senator and to ask him if he knew that of the six of the committee who appeared before the Military Committee of the Senate to present this matter last December, three since that time have passed away?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have been so informed.

Mr. KENYON. And these old soldiers are passing away at a rapid rate. If there is any merit in this bill, and if we are going to do anything for them, it should be done at this session of Congress, and not be any longer delayed.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I quite agree with the Senator from Iowa. To me it is a very serious matter. Since I introduced this bill, I have met the committees of the old soldiers who have had it in charge. There have been four different chairmen, distinguished soldiers, men who had the confidence of the Army and of the country, and three of those four chairmen have now been mustered out and can not be here to share in whatever victory might come; but neither will they be affected by the humiliation which to-day's vote would have brought them.

Mr. President, I can not properly now go into the merits of this matter as I should like in order to present them to the Senate and to the country. I am forced to wait now, and to allow the bill to rest until possibly some more favorable occasion may arise.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION.

The Senate, as in Committee on the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13811) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I have dwelt on the lack of uniformity of our statistics relating to river and other traffic, but more important still is the inadequacy of those statistics. They are insufficient to furnish a satisfactory basis for formulating a policy that we may adopt. I think, perhaps, I ought to qualify that statement by saying that we have sufficient statistics to indicate certain marked tendencies, but if we had them in more lucid shape we could be more assured of our conclusions. In order that statistics may be adequate, I repeat, the details as to ton mileage as well as the number of tons is absolutely essential, as that affords the best test of the use of a navigable stream. The average haul and ton mileage is given on some rivers, but not on others. These statistics have only been given, as I recall, since the recommendation of the National Waterways Commission in 1910. In order that the increase or decrease in traffic may be recognized, comparisons should be given for successive years. It should be stated that in volume 1 of the Report of the Chief of Engineers for 1912 many of these comparisons are given—some of the figures relating to tonnage go back as far as the year 1890—but, generally speaking, figures are only given for the year for which the report is made. It is perfectly evident that, if we wish to ascertain whether or not an improvement is judicious and profitable, we should know the extent to which these channels have been used for a period of years, whether river traffic is increasing or diminishing, and this can not be ascertained by taking up each stream with its traffic for one year as if that stood out by itself.

In this regard I wish to call attention to a French publication, Statistique de la Navigation Interieur, which is perhaps the most perfect book published for the presentation of statistics on inland waterway traffic. I will say to my friend the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], who more than a week ago expressed a wish that I might finish my remarks during that afternoon, and to my friend from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], who seemed to have some degree of apprehension that my remarks might continue for a very long time, that while this is a most formidable appearing book, I shall read from it only very briefly.

Mr. KENYON. I did not want the Senator to shorten his remarks out of any consideration for me.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Ohio does not mean to imply that by what I said I wanted in any way to unduly push or press the Senator?

Mr. BURTON. Oh, no; I suppose it was possibly only in anticipation of the length of my remarks and not from any effort at all to limit my time.

The French statistics relating to rivers and canals divide the traffic into two classes: First, that originating on the river or on a stretch of a river; and, second, that originating outside the river or the particular stretch in question.

The first class of traffic, that originating on the river, is again subdivided into two varieties—traffic between portions of the river in question and that which originates within and is shipped outside.

Suppose we take, as an illustration, the Mississippi River between St. Louis and Cairo. The first variety of the first class of traffic would be that on the portion of the river between St. Louis and Cairo, and the second, that originating somewhere at or between St. Louis and Cairo and going outside. The second class is subdivided into two varieties or kinds—that made up of freight originating outside, and includes, first, what are called arrivals, those coming from outside the stretch or the river to a point on the stretch or river; and, second, that passing clear through without stopping. The second variety of the second class would be illustrated, using the same example as before, the Mississippi River from St. Louis to Cairo, by traffic originating at Keokuk or Burlington, passing through this stretch from St. Louis to Cairo and going to Memphis or to New Orleans.

The French statistics give other facts which are vital to this inquiry—the general condition of all traffic, the number of miles or kilometers that are under improvement in the whole country, and so forth.

For the year 1904, which is the date of the volume I have before me and which seems to be the latest available in the Congressional Library, the total length of waters in France is given at 16,687 kilometers, of which 12,070 were used in that year, showing the abandonment of 4,617 kilometers. It again gives a description of lines principal and lines secondary. The lines principal are those which are 2 meters or more in depth—that is, about 6.6 feet—and those of less depth than that. The volume states the total tonnage and the total kilometric tonnage for each year, the latter with quite as much care as the former, and a list of freights by routes of navigation, so that we may know in what particular portions of France certain commodities are shipped upon the rivers.

It gives carefully a separate statement of that traffic which is carried by self-propelling boats and that carried by barges, towed by steamers or from the banks. The tendency is very decidedly toward an increase in the traffic carried in barges as against that carried in steamers running by their own power. Anyone who studies this subject can realize how important that is. If any persons were thinking of engaging in the traffic, say, on the Mississippi River, and the question should arise, "Shall we ship from St. Louis to New Orleans by steamer or by barge?" they would not be safe in determining which of the two should be adopted without knowing what the tendencies are not only in this country but abroad. So far as our statistics are concerned, unless one gather it from personal observation or from some merchants' exchange or commercial organization in this regard, he would be very largely in the dark.

Another thing: A comparison is given of the traffic on the rivers from the year 1847 to date. French economists use these tables to aid them in pointing out for a period of more than 60 years which years were prosperous and which were not. No one could exaggerate the value of this class of statistics if we possessed them in our own country.

Again, there are more extensive and more detailed figures, beginning in 1892, on which comparisons can be made from year to year, and they are published in the same volume, and side by side.

Still further, the tonnage is given by ports or cities on the different streams and also the tonnage passing through the city of Paris. One important item which is carried in each report is the total amount of traffic on all the rivers and canals in France. Other European countries, though in less detail and with less frequency, furnish the same figures. In Great Britain and Wales the total amount of tonnage carried on inland waters is between 30,000,000 and 35,000,000 according to last reports; in France in the year 1912 it was 40,000,000, speaking in round numbers; in the little country of Belgium it is even more; Germany has the largest waterway traffic of all of the European countries, aggregating, according to the last available annual report, some 90,000,000 or more. I believe the figures are not available for the last few years.

It would be impossible by any amount of labor to ascertain the total tonnage on the rivers of the United States. In making a rough approximation, I would say that more than one-half of the inland traffic on all our rivers and lakes was on the Great Lakes and connecting waters, and, if we were to multiply the amount of tonnage and the distance hauled the proportion on the Great Lakes would probably constitute not less than nine-tenths of the whole.

I submit that we should not be left altogether in the dark as to the facts which indicate the tendencies of traffic. It is, perhaps, an appropriate time to repeat that quotation of Mr. Gradgrind, from Mr. Dicken's novel Hard Times, "What I want is facts"; and we do not have them in any official report now before us. We can gather them from a multitude of publications of trade organizations, from official reports of the Census Bureau, the Bureau of Corporations, and the Engineer's reports; but we are more or less in the dark as to what the tendencies are not only as to traffic on rivers but on all related questions of transportation by water in the United States.

And yet the figures could be furnished without very great difficulty.

I want to refer again to another important line of figures contained in the French report, and that is as to the commodities that are carried. When compared from year to year these show very distinctly the tendency, namely, that river traffic is made up almost entirely of coarse material. I will read briefly from the figures given for the year 1904.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator if these figures have ever before been presented to the Senate?

Mr. BURTON. I think not in detail. Some references have been made to these figures in certain reports, especially in the reports of the National Waterways Commission, and to a slight extent in the report of the Inland Waterways Commission.

Mr. KENYON. It does seem to me that during the presentation of such important figures as these there ought to be a larger attendance of the Senate. I will not suggest the absence of a quorum, because it will break into the Senator's argument; and I realize that the Senator wants to finish his remarks.

Mr. BURTON. I realize, Mr. President, that figures are dull and in no sense attractive. I hope, however, to bring these facts to the attention of the public; and those who are responsible for the collection of statistics, I trust, will profit by them; and I have no reason to complain of the attention paid right here in the Senate.

Mr. KENYON. I observe, Mr. President, that on the side of the party charged with responsibility there are only seven Senators present, and one, I think, is now passing out of the room, or probably two are passing.

Mr. BURTON. There is one on this side.

Mr. KENYON. And one on this side. It does seem to me that in voting away such a large sum as $53,000,000 the party responsible for the conduct of the Government ought to have a larger representation present to listen to these figures.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the Senator did not mean to say that there was only one present on the minority side. He meant that one of the majority was sitting on the minority side.

Mr. KENYON. That one member of the majority party was sitting on this side.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I think I should prefer to proceed.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to say that I think the Senator from Ohio in his discussion of this subject has ordinarily had a pretty fair attendance of the Senate. We all understand that at this hour, for reasons I need not state, a number of Senators are generally absent.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I recognize that the material which I am using now is the least attractive—I trust, at any rate, that that which I shall present later will prove more attractive—of anything pertaining to this subject; but I am dwelling on it at considerable length because it is vital. We can not know how to frame river and harbor bills without having these facts before us.

Now, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD a translation from this statistical statement of interior navigation in France for 1904, taken from the top of page 54. It is brief, and I will refer to it in my argument.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, permission is granted.

The translation referred to is as follows:

Statistics 1904.

Types of traffic or merchandise.	Tonnage in 1904.		Average haul in 1904.
	Tons.	Ton mileage.
		Kilometers.	Kilometers.
Combustible materials	9,785,796	2,187,681,379	223
Material for construction	11,776,648	871,321,678	74
Fertilizers	1,549,849	113,926,077	73
Wood fuel and lumber	1,819,949	315,460,592	173
Metals and machinery	821,625	227,771,154	277
Raw materials in metallurgic industry	1,522,066	338,221,336	222
Industrial products	1,065,607	298,109,202	280
Agricultural and food products	3,791,274	575,047,099	152
Miscellaneous	323,556	31,701,382	98
Wood floated, of all kinds	151,075	9,145,000	60
Total	32,607,447	4,968,385,799	152

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, in the first place, this table shows very clearly the tendency toward the limitation of the traffic on rivers to coarse material. The two leading articles which stand out by themselves are, first, combustible materials, 9,785,796 tons. In order that I may be thoroughly understood I should say that in the year 1904 the total traffic on the rivers of France was 32,607,000 tons, but on these rivers in the year 1912 the traffic had increased to 40,000,000 tons, and 9,785,796 tons of that traffic were made up of combustible material, practically coal, lignite, and coke. The next is materials for construction, including minerals, 11,776,649 tons. That is the largest item. Those two together constitute almost exactly two-thirds of the actual tonnage for the total traffic on all French rivers and canals. Next come agricultural products and provisions, 3,791,000 tons. Next to that come wood to burn and wood for service, which means lumber for use in building. Next to that comes fertilizer.

Anyone who studies the statistics will see in the figures of the first two items, coal and building material, a very important point. The average haul of the coal is 223 kilometers. The average haul of the building material is only 74 kilometers, a little less than a third as much. That is, the building material is made up of quarry stuff, of bricks, of material for plaster, that will not bear the expense of a long haul; so the kilometric tonnage or ton-mileage for those articles is less than for any other important article. Very much of this coal comes from Belgium, and is hauled a considerable distance to the city of Paris.

One very interesting fact in regard to the French river statistics is that the traffic very largely focuses around the city of Paris. The city of Paris has a much larger tonnage in water traffic than any of the seaports of France; and building material, coal, and other articles of kindred nature are brought in there by boat.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator from Ohio, who has had large experience in formulating and participating in the passage of legislation of this kind, is endeavoring, I understand, to inform us how this legislation should be formulated and enacted. I wish to ask the Senator whether he has formulated any plan or system that he has submitted or expects to submit to the Senate for enactment?

Mr. BURTON. That is, for the whole bill or for the statistics?

Mr. WORKS. For the whole bill; the manner of making appropriation for rivers and harbors.

Mr. BURTON. No doubt I shall do so before I finish. I will answer the Senator from California by an illustration. In one of our colleges a distinguished professor being asked his views on a certain subject replied to the student, "You will find that treated in my works, volume so-and-so, page so-and-so." The student said, "Yes; but, Professor, I have already examined that volume and I do not altogether understand it." The professor replied, "Well, those are the best views I have on the subject."

I have pointed to the act of 1907, which I think in itself, and in the report accompanying it, furnishes a guide to follow, namely: Begin no new projects unless you provide for their completion. That, of course, does not apply to an indefinite, indeterminate project like the Mississippi River below Cairo, where levees and revetments are to be constructed from year to year, but it does apply in a general way. I will point out another idea which is exemplified in that bill: Make progress on the old projects. If a dozen are up for attention, instead of going along as in this bill and making insufficient, almost trivial, appropriations on the entire dozen, postpone 9, 10, or even 11, and take up one and finish it.

I think in any consideration of the bill the fact will have to be taken into account that our appropriations for harbors have been far more profitable than those for rivers. I would take into account—and I want to dwell on that at length before I conclude my remarks—the different conditions pertaining to our inland waterways. There has been a revolution in that regard. I do not blame the men who in the past have made appropriations for these various rivers with the idea of developing navigation. There is a certain class of them for which appropriations can be made now. But we are not keeping pace with the times. We are seeking to develop and utilize obsolete methods of transportation.

I would take that into account. I would especially have regard for avoiding waste in the construction of locks and dams on many of our rivers. When we come to that point we shall find that right there has been the very worst extravagance and waste of public moneys.

I have gone over this matter in a somewhat fragmentary way, and I thank the Senator from California for asking the very practical question whether I propose any substitute. Before we are through with this bill I shall seek to formulate and put into the form of amendments some definite propositions on this subject. I will say, further, that if a certain amount of this bill were stricken out—I do not want to say what fraction—it would not be objectionable. I saw a statement a few days ago to the effect that only one-half of 1 per cent of this bill was objectionable. I am inclined to think that in the course of the debate any contention for such a percentage as that will be abandoned, and some very much larger fraction will be conceded.

Mr. WORKS. I was wondering whether an independent act might not be passed providing how these appropriation bills should be made up or how they should not be made up. Of course, if you simply go on formulating these river and harbor bills without any guide or any means of determining how they shall be drawn, you will probably have this trouble every time an appropriation bill is presented here. I think the Senator has been struggling against this very condition of affairs, at least ever since I have been in the Senate, and I suppose for years before I came here, and nothing seems to be accomplished. The same condition of things arises every year. Now, if some independent statute could be formulated that would provide the system which should be adopted in making these appropriations and formulating a bill, it might be very effective.

I wish to say to the Senator that I am very much in sympathy with a good many of the things he is saying here. I think we are squandering a good deal of money in these river and harbor appropriations which, in some way, ought to be avoided.

Mr. BURTON. I do not think the great fault lies in the system. After the adoption of the act creating the Board of Review, in 1902, and during the years in which the members exercised conservatism it was comparatively easy to frame a bill that should have no objectionable items; that is, no new ones. There were a number of old ones, features that it was difficult to get rid of. The committee for about 10 years preceding and including 1907 put them out—eliminated them. They did it against popular pressure, against attacks in Congress, in the House and Senate, and much more bitter attacks by newspapers and others outside. I think we were making progress, so that by 1907 a very much better bill was framed, though it was not entirely free from objectionable items. Indeed, Mr. President, while I have a certain amount of pride in that measure, I would be willing to concede that there was more than one-half of 1 per cent of undesirable items in the $87,000,000 carried in that bill. We did the best we could at the time; but some of them have proven, while not absolutely wasteful, to be injudicious.

In any system of public works there is the danger of making mistakes; but since about 1907 this enormous pressure for river and harbor improvements has grown surprisingly. I have dwelt on that subject before, but I might take it up again. All sorts of clubs and organizations have been established; some of them for the express purpose of promoting some river and harbor improvement, sometimes with ample salaries, with a president and a secretary coming down to Washington to press particular projects. All this elaborate campaign has been carried on to influence Congress.

Before I am through, though with sincere regret, because of my long association with them, I must criticize the present standards of the Engineer Corps. It is time for us to overhaul some of the reports that have been made; but I shall not do so without saying what I have repeatedly said, that it is not so much their fault as it is the pressure from the people behind them, a pressure which judges a Member of the House of Representatives, and even a Senator, by his ability to get appropriations. The more objectionable, the larger, and the more wasteful the appropriation, the more credit the Representative or Senator seems to obtain for having secured its insertion in an appropriation bill.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BURTON. I do.

Mr. CLAPP. I think the Senator, by his last expression, would leave an impression that perhaps he did not mean to leave. Of course it is undoubtedly true that the bigger an appropriation the more credit there is to getting it, and it is probably equally true that the bigger the appropriation, if, in fact, reprehensible, then the more reprehensible and less justifiable it is; but the credit is not accorded on account of the recognized absence of justification for the appropriation, which might be inferred from the manner in which the Senator left the statement. It results from the fact that the bigger the appropriation the more credit, and the bigger the appropriation, if, in fact, reprehensible, then the more reprehensible it is.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I have known of some small appropriations that were worse in their quality than the big ones.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; but I do not think the Senator really means that the credit is given for appropriations because of the fact that they are reprehensible.

Mr. BURTON. Oh, no.

Mr. CLAPP. That is what I was pointing out.

Mr. BURTON. If you should go into the locality where the projects are, the people would all say: "This is a commendable appropriation, and all the rest is 'pork.'"

Mr. CLAPP. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. Just a minute. People have false standards as to value. Only a comparatively small number understand or make any study of this problem. They have an exaggerated idea of the benefits that will come, say, from canalization or some other improvement; but judged by the standards of commerce and engineering in their modern development, some of the projects that are approved in the community, and that they advocate in the utmost good faith, are among the very worst.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. I do not believe the philosophy of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] can be absolutely true—if so, it is a very severe indictment of the honesty of thought of our people—that the people of a community are gratified by the size of an appropriation even though possibly the appropriation may not be necessary.

I know of one instance in a community where a Congressman, possibly in conjunction with a United States Senator, secured a very large appropriation for a Federal building. A campaign was coming on. The general sentiment of the community was that the old Federal building was good enough. They had to tear it down; they had to dynamite the foundation of that splendid building in order to spend this large amount. Now, that had just the opposite effect. The people of the community were indignant over that waste of public money; and while a monument is there in the form of a fine Federal building, there was a general feeling that it was money wasted, and the vote of the community went overwhelmingly against the candidate for Congress who secured it. They understood it; they thought of it.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; I quite agree with the Senator from Iowa that where it is recognized that the appropriation is not warranted the people resent it. Perhaps in calling attention to what might be misunderstood in the remarks of the Senator from Ohio I was somewhat careless in my own statement. Of course I did not mean that in cases where the appropriation was recognized as unjustifiable, of the fact that the larger the appropriation the more it was to be condemned, the size of the appropriation increased the appreciation for it.

Mr. KENYON. I think sometimes it increases the disgust that public money is spent in that way.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; when it is recognized that it ought not to be spent. But it is natural that we appreciate favors or benefits, as we may regard them, in proportion to the size of the benefits. What I meant was, the individual looking at the appropriation as a benefit, that the larger the appropriation the more credit was accorded for it; and consequently if the appropriation was in fact a reprehensible appropriation, then it might be said as a sequence that the more reprehensible it was the more credit there was for it.

I think we understand one another.

Mr. BURTON. This opens up a very broad field. There is a great difference between people inert and taking no interest in public affairs and an enlightened public sentiment and popular opinion. I have confidence in the people when they are once aroused. There are no better electors or no more intelligent or patriotic people than the people of the United States, but everyone knows that oftentimes a few who have some selfish interest to gratify are very much more potent in an election than the great mass of people who are indifferent. In all that I say I am making a criticism on the indifference of the average voter, his inattention to public affairs and lack of appreciation of the benefits of the Government under which he lives.

I in a measure concur with what the Senator from Iowa has said. I think there is a very great exaggeration of the benefit obtained by a candidate in promoting his chances through the obtaining of appropriations. I have known many instances in which persons had obtained large appropriations, having plead for them before committees, and afterwards gained no benefit from them, but rather condemnation.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 15613.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15613) to create an interstate trade commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to inquire whether there is any Senator who wishes to speak on the trade commission bill to-day?

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to take at this time about 10 minutes for the discussion of the bill.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield, Mr. President.

Mr. WEEKS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hollis	Nelson	Sterling
Borah	James	Newlands	Stone
Brady	Johnson	Norris	Thomas
Bryan	Jones	Overman	Thompson
Burton	Kenyon	Perkins	Thornton
Camden	Kern	Poindexter	Tillman
Catron	Lane	Pomerene	Walsh
Chamberlain	Lea, Tenn.	Ransdell	Weeks
Chilton	Lee, Md.	Shafroth	West
Clapp	Lewis	Sheppard	White
Clarke, Ark.	McCumber	Simmons	Williams
Colt	McLean	Smith, Ariz.	Works
Gallinger	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.
Gronna	Myers	Smoot

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from North Dakota will proceed.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, a commission appointed to assist in the general development of the business interests of the country might be of benefit to the American people. One with constructive powers undoubtedly would be of some good. One with powers that were designed to prevent improper practices might possibly in the end tend to constructive business and also be beneficial to the country. So there may be some fair features of this bill. I shall not go into the details, but I shall confine my few remarks to-day to only one feature of the bill, and that is section 5.

There are two vices in section 5, vices that must not only seriously affect the producer and seller of commodities but more disastrously affect the consumer. First, this section destroys the main purpose of the antitrust law. Second, it destroys the incentive for any new and untried project by surrounding the individual and hemming him in between two conflicting laws—one law that enforces full competition and another that prevents it—one that punishes him if he does not compete and one that punishes him if his competition is too ardent or too strong.

The antitrust law prohibits a monopoly. It prohibits any and all agreements to fix uniform prices. That law prohibits an agreement even to maintain a just and very reasonable price. It prohibits an agreement to maintain a price which would allow but fair living profits to all. Such is our jealous regard for freedom of competition in trade that we will not allow the benefits that flow naturally from competition to be checked or hindered by any benefit that may flow from an agreed even reasonable price to be fixed upon the disposition of commodities.

In the antitrust law we proceed upon the theory that it is no part of our legislative duty to protect competing businesses against each other, but simply to protect the people against the combination of any business interests. We declare that the interest of the public demands that competition be encouraged to the limit and that combination be discouraged in every respect. Every thoughtful American must admit that this is the only true policy; that while there may be here and there an injustice inflicted as against an individual by reason of too close a competition, by reason of some peculiar advantage which one business is possessed of that is not held by another by reason of practices possibly which we might hold to be perfectly fair, nevertheless the interest of the public demands this free and open competition. The moment we check that, that moment we make fixed and unchangeable the prices of all commodities; that moment we discourage the inventive genius that is ever directed toward the cheapening of production, for why should anyone strive to cheapen production if he can call upon the Government to compel his competitor in business to hold the prices of his commodities and to proceed through such business methods as shall allow him to continue his business with a reasonable profit and without modification?

Now, Mr. President, for the first time in our history we propose to put a limit upon competition and the methods of competition. We propose to declare that all competition shall be fair, and we create a commission, one of whose great duties it is to see that there shall be no competition which does not accord with that commission's idea of justice and fairness. Was ever individual, or any number of individuals, clothed with such vast and far-reaching powers? Of course, no one who will stop to consider for a moment can maintain the proposition that this commission will be able to cover the immense field over which it is given jurisdiction. Incapable because of human limitations to cover the entire field, it will apply its powers and its corrective influences over such few lines of industry as it is able to do, and will omit, from sheer necessity, all other lines of business. It will therefore in its operation bring about one rule of conduct for the few it can not reach and another rule of conduct for the many. But while the many may be ostensibly free, the specter of interference will always hang above every line of business, checking its energy and destroying its courage.

Section 5 is another one of these great governmental steps into the vast field of paternalism, a proposition on its face that is always persuasive. It is worse than paternalism, because it assumes paralysis to a great degree. It says to every American citizen who may be possessed of a reasonable degree of individual initiative and who may be willing to chance his property or his labors in an uncertain undertaking, providng that that uncertanty is compensated by the supposed alluring profits, "You may enter into this enterprise, and if it is successful you may have a fair return upon your investment. If it is unsuccessful and you lose your capital, that is your concern and not the concern of the Government."

All the world's progress, commercial and industrial, has so far been founded upon exactly the opposite theory. Our Nation's progress has demonstrated the propriety of the old theory. Our reason, if we will use it, convinces us that the other method can produce nothing but industrial stagnation in the end. Of course a too rigid control of all business enterprises directed toward minimizing the profits of such enterprises naturally calls for the guaranty of those reasonable profits by preventing unfair competition, but the two combined spell death to the enterprising spirit of the people.

If we need section 5 at all, it is to meet only one practice for which, while there may be adequate laws in the States, there is no adequate governmental provision. No competition should be covered by this bill except that competition which is intended in the end to create a monopoly and destroy competition. The practice of the great business interests, wherever competition originated at any particular point some years ago was to sell its product at a losing price at such point, until it had destroyed its competitor, while it was able to recoup its losses at other points; or, on the other hand, to pay beyond a profit-making price at any point of purchase until it had destroyed its competitor at such point, had become so common and the injustice flowing from it so flagrant that State laws were enacted to check the evil. With these provisions in our Federal statute and covering interstate commerce, section 5 would operate most justly if properly managed.

The question whether or not the competition is in fact in furtherance of a monopolistic design ought to be the only question submitted to the decision of this commission. The mere fact that a manufacturer or merchant may sell his product at a particular point at a loss would not constitute an offense against the term "unfair competition" as defined by the amendment which I propose. For the purpose of disposing of a surplus or of getting rid of an accumulation at the end of a season, the sale of such product at a loss is not only proper and just but often necessary, but if that sale is made not for these purposes, but from all of the evidence it should appear that it is persisted in for the main purpose of getting rid of a competitor, it ought to be stopped, and it ought to be stopped not because it is competition, but because in the end it is destructive of competition and is intended to be destructive of competition.

This commission ought not to be given power itself to determine the multiplex methods of conducting business to determine whether or not the method is fair to a competitor. That shackles trade and destroys competition. Under such an authority the commission could inquire into the merits of the claims of a merchant or manufacturer as to the comparative value of his respective products. In all cases of fraud there is a remedy in the courts of law at the present time. Those courts are created to afford relief in such cases. There is the proper place to litigate all questions of that character. In all cases of trade-mark infringement the remedy in the courts is full and complete. We therefore, Mr. President, do not need a commission for that purpose.

Section 5 in its entirety ought to go out of the bill. If it does not go out, then it ought to be so modified that its only purpose will be to forbid practices that would operate to destroy competition in the end and thereby create a monopoly.

In the discussion of this question a number of days ago I asked the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] if in case a manufacturer of automobile tires, who was selling his product 25 cents cheaper than that of other reputable manufacturers, should give out as a declaration that in their manufacture, and in every other respect, they were up to the standard of the best makes, whether or not the commission would be authorized to investigate that question to see whether the competition created by that declaration and method of advertising would be fair; and the Senator from Nevada concluded that that would be one of the cases which the commission, upon a proper complaint, would be authorized to investigate. That is only one out of hundreds of thousands of practices that are indulged in in the close competition between the manufacturers and the merchants dealing in all kinds of commodities in order to create the competition which the public are demanding.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. McCUMBER. In just one moment. Therefore, Mr. President, if we clothe the commission with authority to investigate all questions of unfairness, there is absolutely no limitation to their jurisdiction, and there is no business that dare enter upon a close competition through the methods usual to-day that would not fear that its energies in the competitive line might be checked by the order of this commission.

I now yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I wanted to ask the Senator from North Dakota if he did not think that possibly the idea lying in the mind of those using the phrase "unfair competition" is really the idea of preventing the destruction or the stifling of fair competition, and whether it would not be better to express it in that way, to forbid any combination or others from destroying or seeking unfairly to stifle fair competition. That would maintain a law of competition by forbidding competition from being destroyed or stifled by unfair means, whereas the general phrase "unfair competition" has not been sufficiently specific.

To forbid a company from unreasonably and unfairly destroying competition, it seems to me, bears a definite meaning, whereas to generally forbid unfair competition does not, because it would be left to somebody to determine what is fair and what is unfair, and perhaps after an honest man has been guilty of an act which in the ordinary course of business is taking place frequently and which is afterwards adjudged to be fair, whereas the court in foro conscientiae pronounces it to be unfair. Is not what we want to do to forbid the stifling of fair competition?

That is the question I wanted to ask the Senator. I wish to say that those phrases were used in a bill which was introduced by me, but the credit of drawing which was for the most part due to a young lawyer in New York by the name of Robert R. Reid. It made that distinction, and I think it is a distinction that will recommend itself to one's intellect.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi is right along in harmony with the remarks that I have just made, that if we are to use the term "unfair," the term ought to have a definition applied to it, so that the commission will know it is intended for the same purpose the Senator thinks it is intended for.

The word "unfair" is a very broad term. It is the converse of "fair," anything that this commission would consider as not entirely within the lines of morality in commercial transactions, of course, would be called unfair, and yet you might not call it unfair; I might not call it unfair. There ought to be a limitation, and that limitation should be fixed in the law itself.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But, if the Senator will pardon me for a moment, I go a step further than that. I do not think you ought to destroy competition at all, but you ought to destroy all combinations seeking to destroy fair competition.

Mr. McCUMBER. How will you destroy them?—because that will lead us to the particular point I am thinking of.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will give the Senator several ways in which to do it. You ought to forbid them from unreasonably and unfairly destroying competition. I always maintain the right of competition, and the only thing I insist upon is that it shall not be stifled by unfair methods.

Now, I will give the Senator an illustration. Here is the Standard Oil Co. They proposed at one time to fight a man in Marietta, Ohio, who was selling oil in competition with them. They immediately reduced the price of oil within the district in which he could sell to a price where it was ruinous for him even to sell. When they got it to that point, they went so far in the little town of Columbus, Miss, as to purchase a general furnishing store. That, Mr. President, is an old-fashioned city, with which you are acquainted [Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas in the chair]. It is one of the few old places left with the fragrance of antebellum civilization, the peculiar southern civilization, about it.

Those merchants had agreed to buy oil of this man Rice, of Marietta. In came the Standard Oil Co. which said, "Well, but we will sell you this oil at half the price." Of course, the merchants knew that they could not sell the oil at half the price profitably, and they were merely trying to run Wright out of Columbus and then later on raise the price of oil. This happened to be in an old-fashioned community, and these men said to one another, "Now, we will not do that." They held a meeting and they said, "We will not do it." They published an article in the newspapers and they said, "We will not do it. This object is first to put the other competitor out of the field and later to raise the price." So that little Columbus town, with no great wealth or anything else, is the only thing upon the American continent that ever whipped the Standard Oil Co.

Finally the Standard Oil Co. came down there and opened a store and sold general supplies, calico, tobacco, and one thing or another in competition with the merchants to make them quit. The merchants said, "We will not quit. We are gentlemen, as our fathers and our grandfathers were; we have given our word to one another, and we have given our word to the community, and, what is more, the customers will not quit us; they will not patronize you." Sometime after that in this peculiar old-fashioned community a man or two did go and buy some things from the Standard Oil commission house, but in the next morning's paper they were out in an apology, saying they had not been advised about it at all and they were not going to do it any more; showing that where real honor amongst gentlemen prevails these trusts can be defeated; but the point I was using as an illustration was not so much to praise a little town, although it deserves great praise, as to show what are unfair efforts to stifle competition.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator has given one.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And what these people call "unfair competition" is not competition at all; it is an effort to stifle competition; it is an effort to take competition by the throat and choke it to death. That is what they were doing, and they were doing it only in a limited field where Rice in Marietta, Ohio, could sell oil, while they were selling oil at the original price or at even an increased price in other places.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, just a moment. The Senator from Mississippi has reiterated in a particular case the same thing that I have been talking about as a general proposition—of one of the cases that should be reached by a proper definition in section 5. Right there will the Senator allow me to carry it a little further on and give him another case where the Standard Oil or some other company may pay higher to stifle competition? Out in my own State years ago, when we had our old-line elevators, with an elevator at every little station—there might be a hundred of them in the State—they, not wanting competition at a particular point, when another elevator would be started they would immediately pay a higher price for grain in its purchase than the other elevator could afford to pay; but they would recoup by cutting down the price at the several stations where they had no competition. That gives you the two points—the one which the Senator has suggested and the one which was in my own mind—of selling really at a loss, and the other in purchasing at a loss at a particular point, one of the things already covered by State laws in purely intrastate business, but is not upon our statute books in relation to interstate business.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. McCUMBER. Just one moment. We want to reach those two forms of competition. I now yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, of course I understand, as he does, that there are certain things, as a combination to buy as well as a combination to sell, buying trusts as well as selling trusts and as well as holding trusts and as well as the old-fashioned trustees' trust; but what I was trying to get clear in my mind by suggestion from the Senator—and it was done sympathetically and not critically at all, because I had been listening to what he said with a great deal of interest—was that in speaking of "unfair competition" they have got themselves upon the wrong horse. There is no unfair competition, unless by confusion of ideas a profitless stifling of competition be accepted to mean the same thing.

Mr. McCUMBER. Now for the Senator's definition.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That profitless stifling of competition may take either one of two directions. It may mean selling goods within a restricted area or for a restricted time at less than the cost of production, in order to drive out of trade a restricted competitor—one geographically restricted—or it may be buying the raw material at a price so high that the restricted competitor can not afford to pay for it, and thus drive him out; or it may be by buying the raw material, again, at a price so low that the men who have the raw material can not afford to produce it; but when you go through with it all, it is not always competition, but a stifling of competition, a murder of competition, by unfair and frequently dishonest methods; because some of these people have not stopped merely at that sort of thing, but they have gone further and torn up pipe lines and done a great many other similar things.

In the bill to which I had reference those phrases are used rather than the words in the pending bill. I do not want to take up the Senator's time too long, but the central idea of that bill is that while the Federal Government can not interfere with the State in making a charter to a corporation, the Federal Government can say when a given corporation with a given charter shall be permitted to engage in interstate commerce, and that that shall not be permitted whenever there lies within the charter granted by the State the potentiality of a trust or the actuality of a trust—either one; and that, as the very first thing, we shall go back to the old common-law principle, that where a charter expressly gives power to a corporation to purchase the stock of another corporation of a competitive character, it contains within it the potentiality of a trust—in fact, the actuality of a trust—and that where that express power is not given, then by the common law one corporation can not own the stock of another at all. So all your trust evils come out of the law—out of express law. They come by the law of favoritism; they come by the fact that the charter, which is the law of the being of the corporation, grants rights which were unknown at common law.

What I want to direct the Senator's attention to and the attention of the Senate to, so far as I can, is that the great weapon—I might say shield, too—but the principal weapon that the United States Government has is to deny the right to enter into interstate commerce of any corporation which has a charter, which either has already made out of it a trust or may make out of it a trust from the very provisions of the charter itself, some of them going so far as to give a right to do certain things everywhere else, except in the State of its creation. New Jersey and Delaware have given such charters as that. I would provide that wherever a corporation attempted to step into the national arena with a charter provision that gave it a right to do certain things outside of the State of its incorporation and not to do them inside of the State of its incorporation it should not be permitted to enter into interstate commerce at all, that being one of the illustrations of the things that a corporation ought not to be permitted to enter the field with a power to do whether it did it or not.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from North Dakota has the floor, and I was interrupting him.

Mr. McCUMBER. I merely wish to say to the Senator from Mississippi that I feel complimented that, with his careful analytical mind, he entirely agrees with me concerning what the definition ought to be; in other words, that it ought to be a prohibition against the stifling of competition by unfair means.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is it exactly. That is the language of the bill which I have introduced.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, why not say so in the definition of this term "unfair competition"? Under the terms of the bill the thing that you are to stop is, first, competition; it is to be checked if it is unfair; but after all it is the question of competition. No matter how unfair a proposition may be, if it is not unfair competition you are not going to check it in business. Therefore under the plain terms of your proposed law you are striking at competition. I asked the Senator to give me the occasions under which he would say that "competition" was "unfair competition." He has practically given me two—the main two that have been in my mind.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon me, I will give him a few more.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to finish my sentence. Therefore I have drawn an amendment intended for exactly the same purpose that the Senator intends his words to mean, namely, that the words "unfair competition" shall be construed to mean: "The sale or purchase at a loss of any article of commerce at any particular point for the purpose of destroying competition at such point." This amendment has in view but one thing, and that is practically the same thing of which the Senator approves, to prevent the destruction of competition by unfair means. If the Senator can secure an amendment to section 5 which will either strike out the words "unfair competition" and substitute the words that he has used, or define "unfair competition" to mean any practices that tend to destroy competition by unfair means, then I could see my way clear to vote for section 5; otherwise I could not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon me, this bill—and I perhaps ought to admit that it should be made the subject of a separate and independent speech, instead of intruding it here—provides that a corporation shall not enter into interstate commerce unless it is organized under laws with a charter that shall do or fail to do various things, which I need not now enter upon; but upon the point that the Senator was directly talking about a moment ago it uses this language:

3. If it, directly or indirectly, of itself or in connection with others destroys or seeks unfairly to stifle fair competition in any part of the United States in the manufacture, production, mining, purchase, sale, or transportation of any articles of commerce not the subject of any patent, copyright, or trade-mark held by it either by making or effecting exclusive contracts, rights, or privileges relating thereto—

And the Massachusetts statute already forbids that—by restricting its customers or other persons with regard to price, territory, or otherwise, in freely buying, selling, or transporting any such article, by securing the monopoly or control of raw material or sources of supply—

That is what was done out in Minnesota, you know, when you went into those new fields—or of any business connected therewith, by temporarily or locally reducing prices with intent to stifle competition—

Which facts must be proven to the satisfaction of a jury, of course—by accepting rebates, or by any other act, device, or course of business that is unfair and tends to secure an unfair advantage and unreasonably and unfairly to destroy competition.

That is the definition which I have given.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes, Mr. President; but that is not the definition which would naturally flow from the consideration of the terms used in the bill. If the Senator from Mississippi will secure the modification of section 5, so that it will be directed against stifling competition by unfair means——

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is the point I am making.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not believe that any of us would oppose it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is really meant in the bill when it says "unfair competition" is the unfair stifling of competition.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then, why not say "the unfair stifling of competition"?

Mr. WILLIAMS. And if it is amended so as to include that, I think, then, it would do away with the objection to that section.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator why not say, then, in so many words, "the stifling of competition by unfair means," and prohibit that instead of prohibiting "unfair competion." There is a great difference between the two.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am agreeing with the Senator as well as I can——

Mr. McCUMBER. I am glad of that; and I hope the Senator will act with me to make it effective.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I agree with the Senator that really the phrase "unfair competition" is too broad, and that it really does mean in the minds of even those who proposed it the stifling of fair competition, and that it ought to be so expressed, and I would go further and indicate how fair competition is stifled.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. NEWLANDS addressed the Chair.

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I suppose the bill to which the Senator from Mississippi has been referring is the bill which he introduced some time ago on the subject of trusts and their regulation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes. I will say it is the last one; I have amended it several times since first introducing it.

Mr. BORAH. I have reference to the last one.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is to be found on page 717 of "Bills and Resolutions Relating to Trusts," fourth print, and is Senate bill 1138.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I had been giving some consideration to that bill, and I want to say, in passing, that I think it is constructed on a sound principle. The truth is that we have no monopolies in the industrial world in this country except those that arise by reason of charter privileges, by reason of the law granting special privileges or special powers or special favors. It is perfectly within our power to control those monopolistic powers by shearing the corporation of the powers, and it is also perfectly within our power to deny the channels of interstate trade to the commodities of any corporation which possesses or undertakes to practice any of those powers.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Just call them "undesirable persons in interstate commerce."

Mr. BORAH. Exactly. While the State can organize the corporation and give it its existence, it is within our power, nevertheless, to say whether it shall engage in the business of interstate trade; and we can say: "You shall not engage in interstate trade until you comply with all the conditions which we denominate as necessary."

Mr. WILLIAMS. And give them a reasonable time in which to get proper amendments to their charters.

Mr. BORAH. Certainly. Then we would have a law with which all must comply, and it would not depend upon the judgment of a commission with reference to the details of business, which, in my judgment, it is impossible for a commission successfully to oversee. I agree very thoroughly with the principle upon which the bill referred to by the Senator from Mississippi is constructed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I want to say one word more, and then I shall not further intrude upon the time of the Senator from North Dakota. What the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has just said is not only true, to wit, that there are no trusts and no monopolies that do not grow out of a special charter privilege, a legally conferred privilege of some description, a privilege conferred by law; but it is also true that if any monopoly could grow up without a legal privilege merely by fair competition and by producing as good an article as some one else, or a cheaper article and a better one, both at the same time, it would have a God-given right to the monopoly. If I could go out to-morrow and raise cotton cheaper than any man in the South without any legal privilege of a special character conferred upon me, without any distinction being given me by law, without any right outside of the law being granted to me specially—if I could raise cotton cheaper than the Senator from Arkansas, cheaper than the Senator from Georgia, and then go further and raise it cheaper than anybody in the South, I would have conferred a benefit upon mankind; in other words, it is not the size of the business that hurts; it is the nature of the business that hurts. You may have a monopoly that has not a capital of over $50,000, and you may have a large business, which is not a monopoly, with a capital of $50,000,000. The first may have gained its purposes by bribery of the town council, and the second may have gained its purposes by fair competition, by exceeding its competitors in the cheapness and quality of its production.

If I can exceed you in cheapness and quality of production or you can exceed me, that is your right, and no man has any right to do away with it until we are prepared to go to socialism and to do away with property rights altogether, and that I am supposing not to be discussed right now. But there is not a trust, there is not a monopoly, there is not a quasi monopoly, there is not a thing of any sort that exists in this country that hurts the industrial character of the people that does not owe its existence to special privilege conferred by law, and generally by charter law.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator says that if a combination or an individual can produce an article cheaper than anybody else and thereby get control of the market and in a sense create a monopoly, that would be a blessing to mankind. I agree with that proposition, but it would only be a monopoly, in all probability, if he were not protected by special privilege, for a limited time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not believe there ever would be one.

Mr. BORAH. Even if there were it would only be for a limited time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was merely supposing that if a man acquired a monopoly in that way it would be all right; but no man ever acquired one in that way in the entire history of the world, and I do not believe anybody ever will.

Mr. BORAH. Somebody else would get onto his scheme unless it was protected by law; so if you were producing an article cheaper and putting it upon the market, finally you would find a competitor, if everybody had an equal chance, who would do the same thing, and it would only be a monopoly, if at all, for a limited time. A monopoly comes from the fact that through a corporate charter certain privileges are granted and certain advantages given which are utilized for monopolistic purposes, and which protect the corporation from competition, when they can dispose of goods, not of better quality, but of worse quality, by reason of certain privileges granted by law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And as a consequence of special privilege they produce inferior goods.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] finds fault with the phraseology that is used in section 5 and indicates that if that phraseology is changed, in order to suit his views as to what should be forbidden under this phrase, he would vote for the bill. He is reenforced by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who declares the term "unfair competition" is hardly an accurate expression; that what we are seeking to do is to prevent the stifling of fair competition; and the Senator from North Dakota declares that the two Senators are in accord. We are discussing the question of a phrase, the meaning of that phrase, and the adaptation of that phrase to certain conditions which we seek to correct by law.

I want to do the same thing that the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from North Dakota want to do—to prevent the stifling of competition by unfair methods. The courts have given us a phrase and the economists have given us a phrase in "unfair competition" that covers that very ground.

It is true that there is contention upon the floor of the Senate as to what the term "unfair competition" covers; but it is admitted now by all that it has a legal significance. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] at first claimed that it had no legal significance which could be enforced. Later, however, he admitted that it did have a legal significance, but that that significance applied to only one form of stifling fair competition, and that was the passing of goods of one man off as the goods of another, vulgarly known as "passing over"; and he complains that our purpose would be defeated if the operation of the proposed statute were confined to that single method of stifling fair competition by unfair methods. Those who support the bill, however, have presented authorities, both in economics and in the decisions of courts and the decrees of courts, showing that the words "unfair competition" have the very meaning of stifling fair competition by unfair methods.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Destroying or stifling.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Destroying or stifling by unfair methods. Legal terms are elastic. The common law would not be what it is if it had not adapted itself to new conditions and new circumstances. During the last 20 years the question of trusts and monopolies has become the absorbing question of discussion in this country, and we find that the courts, in passing upon the Sherman law, have in their decisions and in their decrees used this phrase as an all-embracing phrase.

Chief Justice White, in the Standard Oil case, speaks of "unfair competition, such as"—not simply such as "passing over," as the Senator from Missouri would contend—but "such as discrimination in price, bribery of employees," and two or three other instances in a carefully considered decision of the court, where every word was weighed, not only by the learned Chief Justice, but by every Associate Justice on that bench; and we find the term used in decrees as an all-embracing phrase. I will not weary the Senate by reading these decisions or decrees. They will be found in the remarks which I made in presenting this bill, in the remarks of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], in the remarks of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], and in the very able address of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] yesterday, in which he met fully and completely every criticism that has been made upon this phrase, and I beg Senators who did not have the pleasure of hearing that speech to read it, for it is a strong, close, legal argument upon this single proposition.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I had the pleasure of hearing the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] yesterday, but I am not able to say that I agree with him at all in his conclusions with reference to the application of the term "unfair competition." It seems to me, having in view the colloquy between the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] a moment ago, that nothing is to be gained by in general terms "prohibiting the stifling of fair competition," for in such case unfair methods are resorted to by a competitor, and it all comes back to the question as to what is "unfair competition" and to the fundamental question whether a statute authorizing a commission, in the broad terms of this bill, to prevent "unfair competition" is not a delegation of purely legislative power.

Under section 5 of this bill there is no rule or standard by which the commission is to be governed. There is no named contingency on the happening of which the powers of the commission are to be exercised. As to what will or will not constitute unfair competition, the Legislature, in section 5, gives no hint whatever. It fixes no standard of just dealing between competitors. It does not even venture to say that methods which in the manufacture, production, or distribution of a commodity will give undue preference or advantage to one competitor over another, or will be to the prejudice or disadvantage of another competitor, shall be deemed unfair competition and under the ban of the law.

There is this further thing to be noticed in the bald terms in which section 5 is framed: The element of injury to the individual or to the public is not necessarily involved, I think, in any term or phrase or paragraph of the bill. The Legislature, having furnished no test or guide, throws upon the commission the whole burden of investigating, comparing, speculating, and finally declaring for itself the various elements that enter into unfair competition. This certainly involves a legislative function, a power we are forbidden under the Constitution to delegate.

Mr. President, this commission, no more than we ourselves, can find a precedent—notwithstanding what has been said by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]; notwithstanding anything that was said, I think, by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] in his able speech of yesterday—for its guidance under a statute like this, failing as it does to give instance, example, or definition of "unfair competition" or to specify any condition upon which the commission would be authorized to exercise its power to hear, determine, and restrain any alleged act or condition on the ground that it constituted unfair competition.

Reference has been made to the statutes of several States; and in the speech of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] the titles of the acts were given, and just enough of the statute to indicate that it was a prohibition against unfair methods in buying or selling any commodity without naming the methods which under the acts constitute unfair competition. If, however, the commission should take for its guidance the acts which by statute in different States constitute unfair competition, that would be the same as to declare that Federal law should follow State law, and what power on earth can do that but the Congress of the United States?

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. STERLING. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. I think the fact that the Senator has an amendment pending is a very strong argument in support of the Senator's position. The Senator has an amendment pending designed to prohibit local underselling, as it is called.

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. Now, without that amendment being adopted, assuming that the provision in section 5 is constitutional, the commission could declare the act prohibited in the Senator's amendment, and make it unlawful. On the other hand, without the declaration of the commission or of Congress, local underselling is now lawful. In other words, if the authority sought to be conferred by section 5 is valid and constitutional and as far-reaching as the friends of the bill contend, we absolutely delegate to the commission power to enact a law prohibiting local underselling, or refuse to act. It seems to me the Senator's relation to that very amendment is a complete support and justification of his argument.

Mr. STERLING. I thank the Senator for his observation; it is very pertinent.

Mr. President, it is urged that the powers given the Interstate Commerce Commission afford an analogy for section 5, and justify conferring upon the trade commission power to prevent unfair competition; but, according to my view, the cases are not parallel. Why? Because, first, the statute, the interstate-commerce act, requires that the rates of the common carrier shall be just and reasonable; and, second—and this is the important thing that distinguishes the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission from any power given the trade commission under this bill—with the Interstate Commerce Commission, and under the law governing it, there are the known or ascertainable factors from which it can be determined whether the rates are reasonable and not confiscatory. There is the element of physical valuation of the railroad, the value of roadbed, of iron, of rolling stock, the element of operating expenses, of depreciation, of the volume of business, and of reasonable profit.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. STERLING. I yield; certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I do not want to interrupt the Senator if it is not agreeable to him.

Mr. STERLING. It is entirely agreeable, Mr. President.

Mr. NELSON. Back of all this lies the chief feature that distinguishes one case from the other. In the case of railroads, because they are quasi-public corporations, we assume the power to regulate the rates; not only to prescribe the mode in which they shall do business, but also the rates they shall charge the public.

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. We have no such power to fix rates in respect to other corporations or other businesses. We may in a measure regulate them; but when it comes to telling them what they must charge for their commodities, and what service they must render the public, we are perfectly powerless. So the proposed trade commission can not operate like the Interstate Commerce Commission to protect the public to that extent.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Minnesota for calling attention to the distinction. It is a very important one. In the one case it is a quasi-public corporation and in the other a private corporation.

Aside from that, however, I have mentioned the elements that can be considered in fixing rates. These elements present, their use in determining a reasonable rate for the carriage of persons and of property is a matter of figures, of computation; and the legislature having prescribed that the rates shall be just and reasonable, the problem of determining whether under given material conditions they are so or not may well be left to an administrative board or tribunal. The fact that it is does not make of such board a legislature.

I speak of the material conditions with which the Interstate Commerce Commission has to deal. I do so to distinguish such conditions from the varying speculative and ethical conditions and standards with which the trade commission must be confronted if it has no other guide than a statute authorizing it to prevent "unfair competition."

There are a few methods of competition which we know to be unfair. Some of them have been enumerated here. They are the subjects of various State statutes already. They cause injury and financial loss to competitors and in turn to the public. I would see that these have the mark of our disapproval in a measure which shall, in general language, describe them rather than burden this commission with that which, in the nature of things, is impossible of achievement.

These now present themselves to my mind as practical considerations: In the work of the commission, in the questions that will be brought before the commission to decide under a law such as is proposed by section 5 of this bill, we open wide the doors to a consideration of the innumerable standards of business morals, to questions of business ethics, varying as they will with the individual, with the community, with the particular trade or with the times. What a fine opportunity for the man who never is, but is always afraid he is, going to be hurt. What a fine chance for the overzealous and self-constituted guardian of the business morals of the community. And how tempting the situation will be to the man inspired by fear or jealousy of a business rival.

I think it requires no great stretch of the imagination to see these as some of the possibilities arising out of the very generality of the term "unfair competition," and the prohibition against the use, not of any known or designated method of "unfair competition" causing some known or designated injury, but just "unfair competition."

Mr. President, if I may be allowed to paraphrase, I think it is better to cure the ills we have than dare fly to others that we know not of.

In view of the intensity of competition now in many lines of trade, perfectly independent concerns will, without combining in restraint of trade at all, without discrimination between communities or individuals at all, be induced to cut prices to the general public. Some competitors with fewer facilities, or whose pay rolls show a higher wage, will be hurt, and may be forced out of business, and there will be many who will be heard to say that competition of this kind is unfair and ought to come under the ban of the law.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question right there?

Mr. STERLING. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] might answer it, as he is fathering this bill; but I should like to ask the Senator from South Dakota the same question that I intended to ask the Senator from Nevada.

Take, for instance, an illustration of this kind: Here are two manufacturers of proprietary medicines. One of them has an elixir that may be possibly of some benefit in the cure of tuberculosis, and he advertises it as a cure. Some one else gets up a concoction, and he also advertises that it is a cure for tuberculosis, and he puts his product in competition with the other product. It may be absolutely valueless, having no medicinal power or efficacy whatever. Now, would the trade commission, under the term "unfair competition," be authorized to investigate the question of the merits of those two proprietary medicines?

If I understand the word "unfair," I can not imagine anything being more unfair than to put a spurious article against one that might have some virtue. If that would not be unfair competition, then I should like to know what would be unfair competition or where would be the limit of the jurisdiction of this commission.

Mr. STERLING. I think under the terms of the bill the jurisdiction and power of this commission are limitless. They can make all such inquiries, without regard to whether or not the competition has served in any sense the interests of the public or contributed to the public welfare.

That calls to mind a clipping made from a Washington paper just a few days ago in regard to competition in the sale of oil and gasoline. It is headed:

GASOLINE PRICES ARE MANY—REFINERS' WAR REDUCES GALLON COST TO 10½ CENTS IN MICHIGAN—COAL OIL AND NAPHTHA ALSO GREATLY CHEAPENED AS RESULT OF PRODUCERS' FIGHT IN INDIANA.

I will read just a paragraph or two from this clipping:

As a result of the cuts in the prices of petroleum products it is stated that most of the Standard Oil refining companies will not make as good a showing in net earnings for the first six months of the current year as in the same period last year. The gasoline business is in a very good condition, a large increase having been made, but the consumption of lubricating oils, particularly in the East, has taken a big drop.

That must mean that the gasoline business is in good condition so far as the public is concerned; and yet probably under the provisions of this bill some firm or corporation engaged in the sale of gasoline would be heard to say that somebody had practiced unfair competition.

Crude oil prices generally have been cut anywhere from 20 per cent to 30 per cent, while prices of refined products have shown reductions of from 20 per cent to as high as 40 per cent in some cases. In the Middle West the consumption of refined oil is understood to have increased greatly this year, but prices have been reduced more in this territory than any other, principally owing to severe competition.

The concluding paragraph of the article is:

A price war being held by garage owners in Jersey City has reduced the price of gasoline from 20 cents to 9 cents a gallon. The Standard Oil Co. started the fight by selling to a combination of garage owners at greatly reduced figures. Rival garage men combined and made an arrangement with the Gulf Refining Co. to buy at a price less than quoted to their rivals.

Now, whether either of these named companies would complain of unfair competition or not, it is easy to conceive of a situation and of parties wherein the cry would be made that there was unfair competition, although the public was getting the benefit of it. In any event the commission would have a case before it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask the Senator, if one of these corporations was cutting the price with a view to destroying its competitor, and with a view to afterwards raising the price to a high monopolistic price, whether he would not regard that as a method that should be condemned by law?

Mr. STERLING. In answer to that, Mr. President, I think I would say "yes"; I would regard it as such a method; but as to whether or not it would be a method covered by this bill is another question. The only way I see by which we may reach that condition of things is by a section which will describe and define that as a method of unfair competition which the commission may prevent and prohibit.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will say with reference to that, that this phrase would cover just such a transaction, according to the decision of Chief Justice White in the Standard Oil case. He spoke of unfair competition, such as discrimination in price, with a view to destroying a competitor. I do not quote his language exactly, but that was the tenor of it.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I think a wrong interpretation has been put upon the language of Chief Justice White in the Standard Oil case. Reference has been made to it in a number of instances by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], and by some others here. Under what was the prosecution in the Standard Oil case and in the Tobacco Trust case? The Sherman law. Section 2 of the Sherman law prohibits monopoly and attempts to monopolize. In the opinion by Chief Justice White discrimination in price under certain conditions was mentioned as one of the instances of a monopoly or an attempt to monopolize—by thus securing the market or trade away from a competitor; that is all. It does not at all follow from that that this or that act or conduct will be unfair competition under the terms of section 5 of this bill.

In the stress of competition—another practical consideration here—in the methods adopted by the ambitious to succeed as they reach out after business, it will be found that while individuals and corporations keep within the law and do not combine in restraint of trade, nor quite create or attempt to create a monopoly, yet in their advertising methods, in puffing their own, in depreciating the like commodities of others, in the wages paid, in the quality of their output, they will be just on the border line between the fair and the unfair; and it is easy to see that amid such conditions the commission will not be lacking in business.

As to the possibly varying views of different commissioners at different times regarding what would constitute unfair competition, it being to such an extent an ethical question or an economic question, I am sometimes reminded of the saying of the old common-law lawyer, John Selden, who had his misgivings in regard to what the chancellors might do in their decisions. You will remember he said:

'T is all one as if they should make the standard of measure we call a foot a chancellor's foot; what an uncertain measure this would be! One chancellor has a long foot, another a short foot, a third an indifferent foot; and 't is the same thing in the chancellor's conscience.

When you come to consider the different elements and considerations involved in many cases likely to be brought before the commission, and the temptation there will be to bring cases of alleged unfair competition before the commission, the burden that will be imposed upon it can be seen.

Uncertainty in the law, Mr. President, relating to any of the relations of life, whether they are personal, whether they are domestic, whether they are public, is bad enough; but there is trade—"trade, the calm health of nations"—to be subjected to all the uncertainties which may arise from the administration of this uncertain law. I can not contemplate the result with quite a serene mind.

We must concede, I think, that business has suffered severely in the past because of uncertainty in the law, at least in the meaning of the law, which is the same thing; and as business has suffered, so has the public. Happily, however, both the interstate-commerce law and the antitrust law have at last, in their main and most mooted features, received certain and reasonable construction and interpretation. Their administration is wholesome and more effective than it was once thought it ever would be. Through these great acts of legislation as now understood the people of this country have demonstrated their capacity to govern. The instrumentalities of production and commerce can be permitted to live, compete, and at the same time be subject to reasonable control. But business has no sooner understood and adjusted itself to the situation than we are threatened with an act which will open the floodgates of conjecture and speculation as to what business may depend upon.

The difference between the other acts to which I allude and this is that they more nearly define something, and this, too, in terms of the law, so that under given conditions it is not difficult to say whether the law has been violated; but here we turn it over to a commission, to a nonlegislative and a nonjudicial body with all the latitude of prohibition against unfairness in competition that the boys at school used to impose on each other when they went into a fight, where "no scratchin', no kickin', no bitin', no pulling hair, no gouging" was allowed. Which will the commission declare is permissible under the rules of the game prescribed by the commissioners, or will they bar all these and limit the war to a straight stand-up and knockdown and out? It is understood, of course, that they are not to prevent the fight. A waiting and expectant public insists that that shall go on.

No, Mr. President, we overload this commission. Instead of giving them something reasonable, tangible, certain, or even in the language of the law "capable of being made certain," we give them something to keep them guessing, to keep business guessing, to keep the public guessing, to the injury of both business and the public. Business now frets and hesitates under the uncertainties of this bill and the pending antitrust bill. And no wonder, when we consider all that they involve. As I look at the language of that portion of this bill relating to unfair competition, I think if it stood alone I would be tempted to entitle it "A bill to perpetuate uncertainty in business."

I think it clear that the powers conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission are not analogous to the powers proposed to be conferred by this bill on the trade commission.

Let us see if they are really and fairly supported by the authorities relied on in the course of this debate by those who advocate this amendment offered by the committee.

The case of Field v. Clark and the cases cited therein are relied upon by the advocates of section 5 of the bill as it stands. Field v. Clark (143 U. S.) is typical of a number of cases which construe acts of Congress conferring certain powers upon the Executive or some executive official of the Government.

The case arose under the tariff act of 1890. The claim was made by Marshall Field & Co., against whom duties were imposed under the act on goods imported, that the act was unconstitutional, because it delegated legislative powers to the President in giving him power under certain conditions to suspend the operation of the law with reference to imports from certain countries; but the authority given the President under the act of 1890 to suspend the provisions of the act relating to the admission, free of duty, of sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides is not comparable with the authority conferred by the terms of this bill.

There was no uncertainty about the act of 1890. It admitted the articles free of duty. In the interests of reciprocal trade, however, the President was authorized to suspend this provision if countries exporting these articles insisted on imposing a duty on agricultural and other products. It was purely an administrative power, depending for its exercise upon a contingency within the control of other exporting nations. The legislature simply said definitely what should happen in the event of a contingency of which the Executive could take notice as well as the legislative branch of the Government.

The legislature prescribed the exact duties which should be imposed on the goods imported in the event the President should, for the reasons named in the act—not his own—suspend the operation of the act.

To quote from the opinion of the court very briefly in that case:

> He had no discretion in the premises except in respect to the duration of the suspension so ordered. But that related only to the enforcement of the policy established by Congress. As the suspension was absolutely required when the President ascertained the existence of a particular fact, it can not be said that in ascertaining that fact and in issuing his proclamation, in obedience to the legislative will, he exercised the function of making laws. Legislative power was exercised when Congress declared that the suspension should take effect upon a named contingency. What the President was required to do was simply in execution of the act of Congress. It was not the making of law. He was the mere agent of the law-making department to ascertain and declare the event upon which its expressed will was to take effect. It was a part of the law itself as it left the hands of Congress that the provisions, full and complete in themselves, permitting the free introduction of sugars, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides from particular countries should be suspended in a given contingency and that in case of such suspensions certain duties should be imposed.

The court in Field against Clark quotes from the case, Locke's Appeal (72 Penn. St., 491, 498), as follows:

> To assert that a law is less than a law because it is made to depend on a future event or act is to rob the legislature of the power to act wisely for the public welfare whenever a law is passed relating to a state of affairs not yet developed or to things future and impossible to fully know.

The proper distinction the court said was this:

> The legislature can not delegate its power to make a law, but it can make a law to delegate a power to determine some fact or state of things upon which the law makes, or intends to make, its own action depend. To deny this would be to stop the wheels of government. There are many things upon which wise and useful legislation must depend which can not be known to the lawmaking power, and must therefore be a subject of inquiry and determination outside of the halls of legislation.

But, Mr. President, of course, what will constitute unfair competition is not one of the many things which can not be known to the lawmaking power. Presumably it is better known to the lawmaking power than to any other power, and under our system the lawmaking power can not shift the burden and responsibility of determining what is unfair competition upon any other power or department of government. It must be determined within "the halls of legislation."

The case of the brig Aurora (7 Cranch., 382) cited in Field against Clark is not in point, nor is it authority for the proposition involved in this bill. Under the act considered in that case the President was simply authorized in case either France or Great Britain should modify her edicts so that they should cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, he should declare the same by proclamation, and that thereafter trade suspended by the act should be renewed with the nation so revoking or modifying her edicts.

The legislature did not transmit any power of legislation to the President by this act. "It only prescribed the evidence which should be admitted of a fact upon which the law should go into effect." It was competent for Congress to make the revival of an act depend upon the proclamation of the President showing the ascertainment by him of the fact that the edicts of certain nations had been so revoked or modified that they did not violate the neutral commerce of the United States.

The case of the brig Aurora is in line with other cases which have been cited. I do not now recall the titles of all of them, but there is the case arising out of the statute authorizing the Secretary of War to remove unreasonable obstructions to navigation in a river. What is the situation with regard to it? The engineer can determine the fact as to whether a bridge is an unreasonable obstruction or not, and that is altogether different from the case here. So with reference to the case growing out of the statute to prevent the importation of impure tea. Buttfield v. Stranahan, 192 U. S., 470. It rests on the same principle.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. STERLING. I yield.

Mr. BURTON. Before passing from that subject, as to the jurisdiction which the Secretary of War has to declare a bridge an unreasonable obstruction to navigation, I am quite familiar with those decisions and have been connected with some litigation on the subject. First, the right of the Secretary of War to make that kind of a decision was denied quite strenuously. The Senator from South Dakota said that that case can be very clearly distinguished from this case, in which there is the right to decide what is unfair competition. I would prize the opinion of the Senator from South Dakota on that subject and his statement of the particulars in which they differ.

Mr. STERLING. They differ in this, according to my view, Mr. President, that in the power to prevent unfair competition the question is more or less speculative. It is a question of the ethical or economic standard of different individuals as to what constitutes unfair competition. There is no basis, we may say, of physical facts upon which to base the opinion as to whether it is a case of unfair competition or not, whereas in the case of the power given the Secretary of War to remove a bridge or other obstruction that is deemed to be an unreasonable obstruction in a navigable river it is a question of an ascertainable physical fact to be determined by the expert or by the engineer, and which will show whether under given conditions as to the flow of water in the river, the height of the bridge, the size and carrying capacity of the boats, they have been unreasonably obstructed by that bridge. It is a question of computation and of figures, whereas the question of unfair competition may be altogether outside the realm of figures and calculation based on physical facts. In my opinion, I will say to the Senator, there is a marked distinction between the two classes of cases. As is suggested to me by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], one is the opinion of individual men and the other is a matter of exact measurement by those qualified and competent to make it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. STERLING. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Right on that point, according to the Senator's definition, would it not be the opinion of men as to whether the obstruction was reasonable or not? I can see how there might be no opinion involved if it just said there should be no obstruction; but the words used are, I think, "unreasonable obstruction." Would not the word "unreasonable" be similar to the word "unfair," and imply an opinion?

Mr. STERLING. I think not, Mr. President. The question as to whether it is an unreasonable obstruction in the river will depend, as I said, upon the size of the boats, the depth of water in the river, and other facts easily ascertainable. Whether the bridge will in any way obstruct the traffic is a physical fact to be determined.

Mr. NORRIS. That would be true, it seems to me, if the word "unreasonable" were not used; but two men equally intelligent might disagree as to whether the obstruction was of such a nature as to be unreasonable. One man might think it was only a reasonable obstruction, the other might think that it was an unreasonable obstruction.

Mr. STERLING. But, after all and in the last analysis, I would say, although the word "unreasonable"—and I appreciate the force of the Senator's suggestion—is used, it is a question largely of figures and of expert knowledge.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. STERLING. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator wherein this proposed law as to "unfair competition" would differ from a law declaring that every man should be good and should be punished if he were not; and authorizing a commission to determine whether he is good or bad?

Mr. STERLING. I will say to the Senator from North Dakota that according to my view the bill admits of a possibility of that kind, the determination upon the part of the commission as to whether a man is good or not.

Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] yesterday cited the statutes of several States and from those statutes sought to deduce the conclusion that section 5, although in bare terms preventing unfair competition, was sufficient. But, Mr. President, no State statute prevents unfair competition and stops there. The Senator will be able to produce no such statute. A State statute simply prohibiting unfair competition would be quickly adjudged by the court as void for uncertainty.

I have taken the pains to look over the statutes cited by the Senator from New Hampshire, and I find that in every case the specific acts or conduct which will constitute unfair competition are fully set forth.

Mr. President, this ought to be a hint to us here. The very fact that State legislatures in enacting laws of this kind have, without exception, felt it necessary to specify and define the particular things which shall constitute unfair competition is a very good reason why we should follow the same safe course.

Nearly all these statutes, I think all of them, are leveled against unfair competition in buying and selling, and thus discriminating between different sections and cities and communities for the purpose always of crowding out or destroying a competitor. In most States that have such statutes the offense is a discrimination in selling. In a few States, notably in North Dakota, I think, and in Montana, either buying or selling with such intent is an offense.

So the statutes of other States specifying and defining what is "unfair competition," or, in a term more frequently used, "unfair discrimination," instead of affording an argument for the bill as it is, afford the reason why we should specify in this bill what we deem to be unfair competition in commodities in interstate commerce and in providing against such unfair competition. With that in view, Mr. President, I presented several days ago an amendment in which I, in the main, followed the statute of the State of South Dakota. I wish to read this amendment, or a portion of it:

> It shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation engaged in the production, manufacture, or distribution of any commodity in general use and which is the subject of or intended for commerce, as herein defined, to intentionally and for the purpose of destroying the competition of any regularly established producer, manufacturer, or dealer in such commodity, or to prevent the competition of any person who in good faith intends and attempts to become such a producer, manufacturer, or dealer, make or give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person, firm, or corporation in the sale or disposition of such commodity, or to discriminate between different States, sections, communities, or cities by selling such commodity at a lower rate in one State, section, community, or city than such person, firm, or corporation charges for such commodity in another State, section, community, or city, after equalizing the distance from the point of production, manufacture, or distribution and freight rates therefrom.

Now, there is this clause, which is new and is not embodied in the South Dakota statute, namely, that which relates to the making or giving any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person, company, firm, or corporation in the sale or disposition of such commodity.

Then follows this, which I adapt from section 3 of the interstate-commerce act. I want to read that section, and then I will read that part of my proposed amendment of which it is the counterpart. Section 3 of the act provides:

> That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to make or give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, or any particular description of traffic, in any respect whatsoever, or to subject any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, or any particular description of traffic, to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever.

The corresponding part of my amendment reads:

> And it shall be unlawful for any such person, firm, or corporation so engaged in the production, manufacture, or distribution of any such commodity to subject by any charge, rebate, or other unfair means or method of competition any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever.

There is this further important difference, Mr. President, between my amendment and section 5 of the bill. Section 5 is limited to unfair competition practiced by corporations, and corporations alone, but individuals of vast wealth and vast facilities and partnerships with vast wealth and facilities engage in interstate trade and business. Why should they not be under the ban of any law against unfair competition as well as corporations?

Now, Mr. President, there is one other point on which I wish to speak briefly while I have the floor, although I had not expected to speak at all to-day, and that relates to the part of the act conferring jurisdiction upon the courts, or rather that part of the act which fails to confer jurisdiction upon the courts.

As I read this bill when it was first brought into the Senate I arrived at the conclusion at once that no power was given the court to review the proceedings or the order of the trade commission. I thought, indeed, the exercise of any power upon the part of the court to review, on appeal or otherwise, any order of the commission was by a plain implication prevented. Now, note the reading of this particular paragraph:

> Whenever the commission, after the issuance of such order, shall find that such corporation has not complied therewith, the commission may petition the district court of the United States, within any district where the method in question was used or where such corporation is located or carries on business, praying the court to issue an injunction to enforce such order of the commission; and the court is hereby authorized to issue such injunction.

This is the sum total of the power of the court under section 5.

Yet it has been said again and again by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] that the commission is an auxiliary to the court. Under the plain language of this act the court is the auxiliary to the commission, and the court has as much judicial power as the sheriff or the clerk of a court would have, its business being simply to enforce the order of the commission, and that is all. Its powers here are ministerial, not judicial.

Wishing to ascertain the views of some of the advocates of this feature of the bill, I made inquiry of the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] when the bill first came under discussion here in the Senate.

On page 11105 of the RECORD the following occurred:

> Mr. STERLING. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa a question as to whether or not he is in favor of conferring upon this commission the power to determine absolutely, and without appeal or review upon appeal, the question of unfair competition in any given case?
> Mr. CUMMINS. I am. I have the same confidence in the commission—or I shall have—that I have in the court. I believe it will do justice in a greater number of cases than will be done in the courts. Neither am I disparaging the courts, for I think no man excels me in reverence and admiration for our judicial system; but whenever you attempt to regulate commerce in this way through the medium of lawsuits, you have a miserable failure.

Without reading further from that answer and paragraph, I then asked and received answer as follows:

> Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator one further question. Does the Senator from Iowa understand the bill to so exclude the courts from reviewing and rendering a decision on the question?
> Mr. CUMMINS. In helping to prepare this legislation I tried to make it so that the courts would not have the power to review the discretion and the judgment exercised or the facts passed upon by the trade commission.

Mr. President, I have always believed it was the law that in any controversy arising between an individual or a citizen and an administrative or other branch of the Government in which property or contract rights were affected or to be affected the individual had the right some time to invoke the exercise of the judicial power, and in the case of our most summary proceedings (necessarily so, because of the necessities of government), namely, tax proceedings for example, there was somewhere between the time of the listing of the property for assessment and valuation and the time of the payment of the tax or the sale of the property for the taxes the right on the part of the citizen to have the question as to whether it is an illegal tax or an unjust tax or whether the property is subject to taxation submitted to a court for determination.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator a question along that line. I am very much interested in his argument. Under this act, if the commission should decide that something was unfair competition and start to make an order as authorized by the act, would not the party have a right to go into a court of equity and enjoin the commission from making that order?

Mr. STERLING. He might, were it not for the reading of this bill, I would say.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator thinks, from the reading of the act, that it excludes that equity jurisdiction?

Mr. STERLING. Yes, sir; from the reading of the bill and from the interpretation put upon it by the Senator's colleague, the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], it seems to me that that is its plain intent.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If a court of equity has power to enjoin the commission from issuing an order, which is the sole function of the commission and the reason for its creation, then how does the administrative commission take all of these business questions away from the court?

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator if he believes the court would have no power in equity to determine the question of whether an act did constitute unfair competition; whether, if this commission tried to make an order that something was unfair competition when it was palpably not so, that power is withdrawn from the courts under this bill?

Mr. McCUMBER. Under the law or under the principles of right?

Mr. KENYON. Under general principles.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, it was clearly the intention of those who drew the act, if that has any bearing upon the construction of the act, that the commission shall have sole and exclusive power to determine what is fair and what is unfair in methods of competition as to corporations engaged in commerce among the States. The whole idea back of the act, in the minds of its proponents and advocates, as stated by the quotation which the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] read from the RECORD from the answer of the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], is to take this matter of the method of competition among corporations engaged in interstate commerce away from the courts, because you can not decide these business questions by the slow and tedious process of the courts, as they phrase it. They say that system has been tried and been pronounced a failure. Therefore they attempt to confer that power upon this commission, not of lawyers who know anything about what the courts have heretofore decided to be a fair or unfair method of competition, but upon a commission of business men, experts skilled in business, as they say; and that commission of expert business men are to pronounce by their fiat, evolved from their inner conciousness, without any rule to guide them laid down by the legislative branch of the Government, what is a fair and what is an unfair method of competition.

To be sure, the act states that they are only authorized to prohibit unfair competition, or at least an unfair method of competition; but in order to determine what is an unfair method they have got, in their own minds at least, to fix the standard, to wit, what is a fair method, because "unfair" can not mean anything except what is not fair, any more than "abnormal" can mean anything except what is not normal. So, if a court can intervene when a competitor has been disappointed in securing a contract and comes to this commission, either in the attempt to make the successful competitor relinquish half of his contract or sublet a part of it to him or for any other purpose, and can say that the commission which this great Congress has just set up, these experts at $10,000 a year each, sitting continuously in Washington, with power to strangle or to promote such business competition and methods as, according to their unbridled imagination, may from day to day each, sitting continuously in Washington, with power to strangle action of the commission at the start, it shows what an absurdity it is for Congress to set up this tribunal and leave the power with the courts—and I do not believe we can take it away—to strangle the very creature that we are setting up to supersede the courts.

Mr. KENYON. Then if the Senator says we can not take it away, that answers my question; the power will remain in the courts, and a party aggrieved can go into a court of equity and secure his relief. So this would amount to nothing.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think he could. I think this is absolutely worse than nothing, because it evidences such a fundamental misunderstanding of the whole principle upon which our Government is founded—the division of powers into the legislative, executive, and judicial departments—for Congress to sit here solemnly enacting a statute for the purpose of getting away from the courts when they know that under the Constitution a man in this country can not be held in prison at the arbitrary dictum of an executive commission. It not only makes Congress ridiculous, but it puts Congress in the attitude of relegating the free institutions of this country back to the days when executive authority was supreme.

I will not intrude further upon the Senator from South Dakota. I beg his pardon, but I could "orate" upon this subject.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. STERLING. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. This is a very important bill, and I believe Senators ought to be present to hear this interesting discussion. I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota suggests the absence of a quorum. The roll will be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Jones	Norris	Smith, Mich.
Borah	Kenyon	O'Gorman	Smoot
Brady	Kern	Overman	Sterling
Brandegee	Lane	Perkins	Swanson
Burton	Lea, Tenn.	Poindexter	Thomas
Camden	Lee, Md.	Ransdell	Thornton
Catron	Lewis	Shafroth	Tillman
Chamberlain	McCumber	Sheppard	Vardaman
Crawford	Martin, Va.	Simmons	White
Gallinger	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ariz.	Williams
Gronna	Nelson	Smith, Ga.	Works
James	Newlands	Smith, Md.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]. This announcement may stand for the remainder of the day.

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY] on account of illness. This announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-seven Senators have answered to their names; not a quorum. The roll of absentees will be called.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. LIPPITT, Mr. REED, and Mr. WALSH having entered the Chamber, answered to their names.

Mr. CHILTON, Mr. COLT, Mr. CULBERSON, Mr. CLAPP, and Mr. STONE having entered the Chamber answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from South Dakota will proceed.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, a few words more. Whether or not the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] may be right in his view that the power of the courts could be invoked in case of an erroneous order made by the commission, I think it should be so written in the bond. As I recall, one of the great controversies before the Senate at the time the rate bill was under discussion in 1906 related to the question whether or not there should be power conferred upon the courts to review the orders and decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and that bill was not enacted into law until such power was conferred upon the courts.

So here, Mr. President, the powers of the proposed trade commission are greater than, and different from, those which relate merely to investigating and supervising corporations engaged in commerce as defined in the pending bill. Under the orders of the commission as authorized by section 5 property rights and contract rights may be affected; and I insist that power should be conferred upon the courts to review the decisions and orders of the trade commission and to prevent the taking of property without due process of law.

Upon this commission, as this bill stands, both legislative and judicial powers are conferred. The legislative power is vested in the Congress; the judicial power is vested in the "Supreme Court and such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." Neither of these powers can, under the Constitution, be conferred upon this commission.

So, having the objections I do have to the bill as it stands, and in view of the extreme doubt, anyhow, as to whether a court can review the orders of the commission, I have prepared an amendment. I wish to say that in the preparation of this amendment I have followed largely the statute with reference to the powers conferred upon the courts in reviewing the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission, especially the powers as at first conferred upon the commerce court and then by recent act, of course, transferred to the district courts of the United States. I will read the amendment:

After line 22, page 21, insert the following:

"And jurisdiction for the enforcement of any order so issued by said commission restraining and prohibiting the use of any such unfair method of competition is hereby conferred upon the district courts of the United States. Such district courts shall also have jurisdiction of suits to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend any order of said commission restraining or prohibiting the use of any method of competition as unfair: Provided, That the pendency of such suit shall not of itself stay or suspend the operation of such order of the commission, but said court in its discretion may restrain or suspend in whole or in part the operation of such order pending the final hearing and determination of the suit: Provided further, That the procedure in said district courts shall be the same as near as may be as the procedure heretofore prevailing in cases in the Commerce Court and arising out of the orders made by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and that the venue of any suit hereafter brought to enforce, suspend, or set aside in whole or in part any order of said commission restraining or prohibiting the use of any particular method of competition as unfair shall be in the judicial district wherein is the residence of the party or any of the parties upon whose application or petition the order was made or in the district wherein the method or methods complained of as constituting unfair competition are used or employed."

Mr. President, I am not opposed to a trade commission bill as such; I am in sympathy with the provisions of the bill relating to the supervision and investigation of corporations and with its requirements in regard to publicity of the acts of corporations. I wish the bill may be perfected so that beyond question it will serve what I believe to be a fine and useful purpose; but in conferring upon the commission the power to prevent unfair competition we are, as I have said, delegating both legislative and judicial powers. With the amendment to the substantive law which I first read, or a similar amendment, extended if you please to acts of unfair methods in buying as well as in selling, and with this amendment conferring upon the courts jurisdiction to review and annul or to modify any order of the commission, I believe we will have a wholesome and practical piece of progressive legislation.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], I wish to call attention to the fact that this is an act to regulate commerce. Under the Constitution this power is given to Congress, and it has been determined that this power can be exercised by an administrative tribunal created by Congress under a rule prescribed by Congress. The proponents of this bill believe that they have in this bill presented a rule of action, and that the action of this administrative board under that rule is absolutely constitutional.

Mr. President, with reference to the review in the courts, I have to say that it is true, as alleged by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], that it was the purpose of the committee not to make all the facts reviewable by the court. It was the purpose of the committee in framing this bill to make the decision of this tribunal a final one. That, however, has its limitations under the Constitution and the law. The courts can at any time condemn any action under this exercise of power that is confiscatory of property and also can condemn any act that is not authorized by the statute itself; so that, as to the question of authority and as to the question of confiscation of property rights, the courts will be open whatever may be the phraseology of this bill.

As to the wisdom of having a review by the court, that review can be limited to the law or it can cover both the law and the facts, according to the way in which we write the statute. There are amendments now pending covering these questions which I have no doubt will be fully considered by the Senate. Among them is an amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], a member of the committee, in which is provided a review by the courts both as to the law and as to the facts.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the main difficulty that some of us have on this side is in the matter of the construction of the words "unfair competition." Most of us here, I think, are inclined to give those words their usual, common-sense meaning; and, giving them that meaning, they cover an immense field. The Senator is inclined to give them a most restricted meaning, a restriction that holds them within the definition that there must be in the end a destruction of competition, and a meaning almost the opposite of what the words are themselves.

We can sometimes arrive at the necessity and propriety of any legislation by understanding how we can apply it to a given set of facts, and we may understand the view of the proponent of a measure by asking him a question or two relative to the application of his proposed measure to a fact.

Let us suppose that the Senator himself is to draw an indictment against some one who has violated the provisions of the law prohibiting unfair competition. Let us see, for a moment, what he would have to allege. I assume, in the first place, that he would allege that the party had been guilty of unfair competition as against a certain statute. He would then set out, as a second proposition, the facts constituting the offense, wherein the competition had been unfair. He would necessarily have to follow that up with some kind of a result. That is, he would have to declare what the result of that competition had been in order to demonstrate that it had been unfair.

Now, let us suppose that the Senator follows those usual rules in drafting an indictment for a criminal offense. Let me ask him if he would not, under his construction, be compelled to declare in the indictment that the unfair competition had resulted in the destruction of competition; in other words, that it had stifled competition, and that that was its purpose?

I am inclined to believe that the Senator would assume that all those allegations would have to be made, and they would all have to be proven. Therefore, if it is necessary to establish the fact in order to constitute the offense, that the competition had not only been unfair, but that it had resulted or would result in the elimination or the stifling of real competition in the end, why would it not be the proper thing to declare that meaning and intent in the bill itself?

If the purpose of section 5 of this bill is to prevent the unfair competition which results in the end in stifling competition, what possible objection can there be to declaring, in a definition, what you would have to prove if you were to establish the offense in the eyes of any court? Could there be any possible objection to making it so clear as that?

I want to carry that just a step further. The Senator would have to prove that there was competition. He would have to prove that the competition was unfair. Then he would have to prove some kind of a result from that unfair competition. What result would he have to establish under the provisions of his bill? Would he not have to prove the fact that the result was such as to destroy the competition entirely, to destroy his competitor, and thereby create a monopoly?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I presume the Senator would not contend that the result must be proven if we prove that this practice was indulged in with the intent to injure or destroy.

Mr. McCUMBER. The offense certainly must result in something, else you could not say that it was unfair competition. In the end it is competition and the character of competition that is to be proven, is it not?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then the Senator's idea is that the complainant should have no remedy at all until the destruction is complete?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I simply say that you would have to allege the inevitable result of that competition, and to prove it, or else you would have to allege that it had accomplished such results. One of those two things must be done. Now, then, what constitutes the competition? Suppose here is one concern, and you force down prices to such an extent as to prevent its making more than 1 per cent upon its investment. You have competition. Your method has been unfair, perhaps; but as long as your competitor is still in business, and is able to make 1 per cent on his investment, is it such competition as the courts would take cognizance of or this commission would take cognizance of?

Will the Senator answer that query?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, it is impossible for me to answer "yes" or "no" to every inquiry that can be imagined, with reference to a case that would come under this statute. I should say, with reference to stifling competition, that all you would have to prove would be an unfair method whose tendency was to stifle competition. I do not think you would have to wait until the destruction was complete in order to entitle you to make the complaint. I presume the commission would inquire into the general tendency of the practice; and if the tendency was, by the employment of an unfair method, to injure or destroy——

Mr. McCUMBER. Right there is a question: Must it be just to injure or must it be to destroy? There is the crux of the whole case.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Either. Of course, the Senator is aware that in charging an offense against the criminal law it is necessary to be very much more precise and definite than it is under the civil law; and there is, of course, a definiteness of statement in an indictment that would not be required in civil pleadings or in the proofs under them. There is quite a distinction between the civil and the criminal law.

Mr. McCUMBER. We all understand that.

Mr. NEWLANDS. This is simply a civil proceeding, and no penalties are attached to it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Why, Mr. President, if a man is enjoined by the commission from continuing a practice that the commission says is unfair, and the commission applies to a court for an injunction to restrain him, and obtains it, and he violates the injunction, he is put in jail for contempt of court. While this does not purport upon its face to be a criminal statute, the man finds himself in jail without any judicial process whatever. He is there; and the refinements which the Senators draws between the civil law and the criminal law are of very little satisfaction to the gentleman who is sitting on the stone floor of a cell, and is wondering by what sort of American law he has been landed there.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I should like to suggest one idea to the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. WHITE. Yes, sir.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state that the defendant can immediately purge himself by complying with the order of the court.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Without any due process of law whatever? The court has not adjudicated anything. The commission brings you an arbitrary order.

Mr. NEWLANDS. There is no question of being in jail unless he disobeys the injunction of the court.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; he has disobeyed the judgment of the commission. If it were left to the judgment of the court, the Senator from South Dakota would be satisfied. The Senator from Nevada proposes that this commission shall decide whether the method of competition in trade is unfair, and then the commission sends its secretary or its attorney to the court, and it says: "Here is the order of the commission, and here is the seal of the commission. Now, you issue an injunction to enforce this order." As the Senator from South Dakota has said, the judiciary of the United States is to be made the administrative branch of this judicial-executive commission, and compelled to issue this injunction against the business man who has been illuminated by this sort of a process as to exactly what he can do in business; and a man is sent to jail; and then, perhaps, upon a writ of habeas corpus alleging that he has been unlawfully kidnaped and landed in a dungeon in this free country, he can get some sort of a review of the constitutionality of this act.

That is the way the poor, puzzled business man, who is looking for this beacon light of the "new freedom," plaintively singing—is led straight into a dungeon. This bill, which is to uplift and help the psychologically depressed business men of this country [laughter] and guarantee them a new Magna Charta of liberty—for we do not deal in anything less than "constitutions" and "Magna Chartas" and "emancipation proclamations" in these days—is an ignis fatuus. [Laughter.] The "Statutes of the United States" is no longer a sufficiently dignified name to characterize our imperial processes. They must be denoted by grandiloquent and epoch-marking titles.

Lead, kindly light, amidst the encircling gloom—

That is all there is to this bill. When the Senator from North Dakota asks the Senator from Nevada, who is actuated by charitable and benevolent and cheerful optimism about all these things which are perfectly simple in his mind, and who says, "Let us poke it right out, especially as the administration insists upon it"—when the Senator from North Dakota asks the Senator from Nevada to what extent a gentleman can go in indulging in his propensities and ingenuity for unfair competition without landing in a dungeon, whether he has got absolutely to annihilate competition in toto, the Senator from Nevada informs him, radiating geniality upon the Senator from North Dakota, that if the method of competition which falls under the ban of the infallible judgment of this commission has a tendency to unfairness, why, then the court comes right down. The Senator from Nevada would not claim that it had got to be absolutely annihilated, but if it "tends" toward it, or has a "tendency" to impair competition, then the commission acts; and the Senator from Nevada, when he has illumined the situation with that brilliant light, feels perfectly satisfied, and I have no doubt in 5 or 10 minutes will demand unanimous consent for naming a day to vote upon this bill and all amendments to final passage.

The truth of it is, the Senator from Nevada is living in an incandescent fog of optimism and illusion on this matter. He has not landed anywhere upon his feet. The country knows absolutely nothing about what he proposes to give them. They think it is a sort of anodyne of all soporific and oleaginous substances which will be a poultice to the ends of its shattered nerves, when really it is nothing but a scourge and a dose of Spanish fly and cayenne pepper to irritate and drive them to distraction.

If these poor, misguided "uplifters" and business men who delight to come down here and attend a function at the White House and then go away and give an interview about how prosperous their business is in consideration of the free lunch to which they have been treated understood in the faintest degree what sort of a dose is going to be administered to them, to their private books and private business, charged with no public use, heretofore supposed to be allowed to proceed as business men are able to compete with each other in a free country—if they understood that any time they uttered some remark as to politics or business which savored of lese majesty, the next day they were to be visited by a little snooper or spotter from Washington who would pull out his credential card and demand the combination of their safe and all their documents and books and papers and contracts and affiliations with other corporations and individuals—they would subside, both as to their political and their humanitarian sentiments, very quickly. If they understood what this dose of help to the poor business man was to be, they would see that their only salvation is to nip this sort of legislation in the bud, to brand it as undemocratic and un-American and tyrannical; and instead of trying to get this bill amended here and amended there, they would scotch this snake right at its birth and, in fact, never allow it to be born.

The American people know that business will not tolerate such things in this country as a commission to be continually snooping around, charged with nothing but the power to arbitrarily promulgate an infinite and unregulated series of "don'ts." If this commission is fit to decide what is an unfair method of competition, it is certainly fit to decide what is a fair method of competition; and it has got to decide what is fair before it can decide what is unfair. If, in their inquisition based upon an anonymous letter or the complaint of a competitor, they find that the practice is fair upon a complete show-down; if they find that the party who is dragged down here to defend what he has heretofore considered to be lawful competition in business has engaged in no unfair practice, then the man ought to be allowed to proceed in it with confidence, and not be subject, as he would be under this bill, to a suit by the Department of Justice, brought about by the investigations of another series of snoopers and spotters and Government spies.

I say to them that when they have come on here and have shown everything, and have gotten a verdict that they are innocent, and have gotten the indorsement of the very commission that this Government has set up as the criterion of what is fair and unfair, unless there is something put into this bill that when they have been told by one branch of the Government that what they are doing is fair they shall not be prosecuted by the Department of Justice and pronounced by a court to be engaged in an unfair practice or a violation of the Sherman law, then the result of this bill will simply be to make confusion worse confounded. It is not fair for Congress to set up a tribunal to determine the rules of justice and fair play among competitors, and then, after they have gotten the judgment of the Government that what they are doing is fair, to have another branch of the Government free to proceed under another criminal statute and get a judgment of a court that although they were proceeding in accordance with one branch of the Government still they are guilty of a crime and liable to go to jail for it.

Yet such is the half-baked character, not only of what is written in this bill, but such is the confusion of thought among committees and individuals, among newspapers, and among the Cabinet, and in the mind of the President himself that they do not know what is going on. They do not compare the provisions of these bills with the recommendations that the President himself has made to Congress.

If the country knew in what sort of fog we are proceeding, under the pretense of lending firm guidance to their wandering footsteps, there would be a panic in this country. But the country apparently is afraid to attempt to find out. When the great business men of the country come down here to tell us and our committees what they think would be beneficial to them, they are persecuted and hounded as conspirators and lobbyists; and then the same men, or men of equal character or no better character, are invited in honor to the White House, and go away singing the praises of the fountain of all knowledge and bending their pliant necks to the yoke.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if there is any one thing that ought to be certain—and I will direct my remarks to the Senator from Nevada, and he can answer them when he answers the Senator from Connecticut—it is a criminal statute. It is a statute which can destroy my business or send me to jail.

I want to know where I am going to land under the provisions of this bill as construed by the Senator from Nevada. The Senator from Connecticut and myself, we will say, are engaged in a competitive line of business. He may have more capital than I have. He may take means that I consider unfair and which are unfair in his competition, and he may drive down the price of the commodity that we are both selling, until he is able to drive me out of business, and then obtain a monopoly. If that is the limit of the extent to which this provision will go, and no further, it may be all right; but suppose the public gets the benefit of this close competition in a cheaper product, and suppose he has not destroyed me entirely but has merely injured me. Suppose he has made my property so nearly valueless that while I may continue in business at a 1 per cent profit it would scarcely pay me to do so, but I am still continuing in business. Can he be indicted for unfair practices so long as I am keeping alive and keeping up a competition, when the result of that competition is for the benefit of the purchasing public which buys our commodities?

If I understand the Senator correctly, he can be so indicted. If that is true, then this commission has got to say somewhere that I am entitled to some reasonable profit, and it has got to determine what that reasonable profit is, in order to determine whether or not his unfair means is destroying competition.

Is that the authority the Senator is going to confer upon this commission—to determine when that competition has gone far enough, and to say, "Thus far and no further you can go in your competitive methods"? I am assuming all the time that they are unfair.

If the Senator says that they must not be such as will merely cripple me in my business, but must be such as will absolutely destroy my business, then he may find some basis for his claim that a benefit will be obtained by preventing the people getting lower prices, because by doing that temporarily he will hold the competitive field open; but if I understand the Senator correctly, he says that if the unfair practices cripple me as a competitor, if they injure me as a competitor, then, although they do not drive me out of business, the commission could investigate the matter and issue an order that I shall be injured no longer. If that is the case, then I think we are stifling competition, and in the end are doing a great injury to the country.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I have here copies of several statutes from various States, defining "unfair competition." The States from which I have quoted are Nebraska, North Dakota, Montana, Iowa, California, Utah, Wyoming, Louisiana, and South Dakota. I think perhaps the printing of these in the RECORD may be of some use to the Senate by way of affording examples of "unfair competition," and may be suggestive as to amendments offered or to be offered. Therefore I ask leave that they may be printed in connection with my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

STATE STATUTES—UNFAIR COMPETITION.

Laws of Nebraska, 1907, chapter 157:

SECTION 1. (Local unfair discriminations.) Any person, firm, company, association, or corporation, foreign or domestic, doing business in the State of Nebraska and engaged in the production, manufacture, or distribution of any commodity in general use that shall intentionally, for the purpose of destroying the business of a competitor in any locality, discriminate between different sections, communities, or cities of this State by selling such commodity at a lower rate in one section, community, or city than is charged for said commodity by said party in another section, community, or city, after making due allowance for the difference, if any, in the grade or quality and in the actual cost of transportation from the point of production, if a raw product, or from the point of manufacture, if a manufactured product, shall be deemed guilty of unfair discrimination, which is hereby prohibited and declared unlawful.

Laws of North Dakota, 1913, chapter 287:

SECTION 1. (Unfair competition.) Any person, firm, or corporation, foreign or domestic, doing business in the State of North Dakota and engaged in the production, manufacture, distribution, purchase, or selling of milk, cream, butter fat, grain, or any commodity in general use that shall, with the intention of creating a monopoly, or of destroying the business of a competitor or of any regular established dealer, or to prevent competition of any person who in good faith intends and attempts to become such a dealer, discriminate between different sections, communities, towns, or cities, or portions thereof, in this State by purchasing at a higher or selling at a lower rate or price in one section, community, town, or city, or portion thereof, in this State than is paid or charged by such person, firm, or corporation for such milk, cream, butter fat, grain, or commodity in general use in another section, community, town, or city, or portion thereof, in this State, after making due allowance for the difference, if any, in the actual cost of transportation of such commodities, shall be guilty of unfair discrimination.

Laws of Montana, 1913, chapter 7:

SECTION 1. Any person, firm, or corporation, foreign or domestic, doing business in the State of Montana and engaged in the production, manufacture, or distribution of any commodity in general use that intentionally, for the purpose of destroying the competition of any regularly established dealer in such commodity, or to prevent the competition of any person, firm, or corporation who in good faith intends and attempts to become such dealer, shall discriminate between different sections, communities, or parts of this State by selling such commodity at a lower rate or price in one section, city, or community, or any portion thereof, than such person, firm, or corporation, foreign or domestic, charges for such commodity in another section, community, or city, after equalizing the distance from the point of production, manufacture, or distribution and freight rates therefrom, shall be deemed guilty of unfair discrimination.

Laws of Montana, 1913, chapter 8:

SECTION 1. Any person, firm, or corporation, foreign or domestic, doing business in the State of Montana and engaged in the buying, selling, production, manufacture, or distribution of any commodity in general use that intentionally, for the purpose of destroying the competition of any regularly established dealer in such commodity, or to prevent the competition of any person, firm, or corporation who in good faith intends and attempts to become such dealer shall discriminate between different persons, sections, or communities in, or parts of this State, by buying such commodity at a higher rate or price in one section, city, or community, or any portion thereof, than such person, firm, or corporation, foreign or domestic, pays for such commodity in another section, community, or city, after equalizing the distance from the point of production, manufacture, or distribution, and freight rates therefrom, shall be deemed guilty of unfair discrimination.

Iowa Reports, Cornwall, 153, page 704:

Any person, firm, company, association, or corporation, foreign or domestic, doing business in the State of Iowa and engaged in the business of buying milk, cream, or butter fat for the purpose of manufacture, or of buying poultry, eggs, or grain for the purpose of sale or storage, that shall, for the purpose of creating a monopoly or destroying the business of a competitor, discriminate between different sections, localities, communities, cities, or towns of this State by purchasing such commodity or commodities at a higher price or rate in one section, locality, community, city, or town than is paid for the same commodity by said person, firm, company, association, or corporation in another section, locality, community, city, or town, after making due allowance for the difference, if any, in the grade or quality, and in the actual cost of transportation from the point of purchase to the point of manufacture, sale, or storage, shall be deemed guilty of unfair discrimination, which is hereby prohibited and declared to be unlawful, but prices made to meet competition in such locality shall not be in violation of this act; and any person, firm, company, association, or corporation, or any officer, agent, receiver, or member of any such firm, company, association, or corporation found guilty of unfair discrimination as defined herein, shall be punished as provided in section 5028–c of the Supplement to the Code, 1907.

The above section is an amendment to section 5028b of the Code Supplement.

Statutes and amendments to the codes of California, 1913, chapter 276, page 508:

SECTION 1. It shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation doing business in the State of California and engaged in the production, manufacture, distribution, or sale of any commodity of general use or consumption, or the product or service of any public utility, with the intent to destroy the competition of any regular established dealer in such commodity, product, or service, or to prevent the competition of any person, firm, private corporation, or municipal or other public corporation, who or which in good faith intends and attempts to become such dealer, to discriminate between different sections, communities, or cities, or portions thereof, of this State by selling or furnishing such commodity, product, or service at a lower rate in one section, community, or city, or any portion thereof, than in another, after making allowance for difference, if any, in the grade, quality, or quantity, and for cost differences between such places due to distance from the point of production, manufacture, or distribution and expense of distribution and operation. This act is not intended to prohibit the meeting in good faith of a competitive rate or to prevent a reasonable classification of service by public utilities for the purpose of establishing rates. The inhibition hereof against locality discrimination shall embrace any scheme of special rebates, collateral contracts, or any device of any nature whereby such discrimination is in substance or fact effected in violation of the spirit and intent of this act.

Laws of Utah, 1913, chapter 41, page 53:

SECTION 1. (Unfair competition and discrimination prohibited.) Any person, firm, or corporation, foreign or domestic, doing business in the State of Utah and engaged in the production, manufacture, or distribution of any commodity in general use, that intentionally, for the purpose of destroying the competition of any regular, established dealer in such commodity, or to prevent the competition of any person who, in good faith, intends and attempts to become such dealer, shall discriminate between different sections, communities, or cities of this State by selling such commodity at a lower rate in one section, community, or city, or any portion thereof than such person, firm, or corporation, foreign or domestic, charges for such commodity in another section, community, or city, after equalizing the distance from the point of production, manufacture, or distribution, and freight rates therefrom, shall be deemed guilty of unfair discrimination.

Session laws of Wyoming, 1911, chapter 62, page 84:

SECTION 1. That any person, firm, or corporation, foreign or domestic, doing business in the State of Wyoming and engaged in the production, manufacture, or distribution of any commodity in general use, that shall intentionally, for the purpose of destroying competition, discriminate between different sections, communities, or cities of this State, by selling such commodity at a lower rate in one section, community, or city, or any portion thereof, than is charged for such commodity in another section, community, or city, after equalizing the distance from the point of production, manufacture, or distribution, and freight rates therefrom, shall be deemed guilty of unfair discrimination: Provided, however, That this act shall not apply to any case where, by reason of different railroad rates or other natural things in favor of any manufacturer or dealer of goods of this or another State, such manufacturer or dealer sells at a different price than he does in another, in order to meet the competitive rates or other natural things in favor of such other manufacturer or dealer: Provided further, That this act shall not apply to any case where any manufacturer of or dealer in goods manufactured or produced in this State sells products in one place cheaper than in another to meet upon the same or more favorable basis any competition from foreign States or this State: Provided further, That this act shall not prevent the sale of goods at proper commercial discount customary in the sale of such particular goods.

Acts State of Louisiana, 1908, act 128, page 187:

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, That any person, firm, company, association, or corporation, foreign or domestic, doing business in the State of Louisiana and engaged in the production, manufacture, or distribution of any commodity in general use, that shall intentionally, for the purpose of injuring or destroying the business of a competitor in any locality, discriminating between different sections, communities, cities, or localities in the State of Louisiana, by selling such commodity at a lower rate in one section, community, city, or locality than is charged for such commodity by said person, firm, company, association, or corporation in another section, community, city, or locality, after making due allowance for the difference, if any, in the grade or quality of such commodity and in the actual cost of transportation of same from the point of production, if a raw product, or from the point of manufacture, if a manufactured product, shall be guilty of unfair discrimination, which is hereby prohibited and declared unlawful and to be a misdemeanor; and that all sales so made shall be taken and considered as prima facie evidence of unfair discrimination.

Laws of South Dakota, 1907, chapter 131, page 196:

Any person, firm, or corporation, foreign or domestic, doing business in the State of South Dakota and engaged in the production, manufacture, or distribution of any commodity in general use, that intentionally, for the purpose of destroying the competition of any regular, established dealer in such commodity, or to prevent the competition of any person who in good faith intends and attempts to become such dealer, shall discriminate between different sections, communities, or cities of this State, by selling such commodity at a lower rate in one section, community, or city, or any portion thereof than such person, firm, or corporation, foreign or domestic, charges for such commodity in another section, community, or city, after equalizing the distance from the point of production, manufacture, or distribution and freight rates therefrom, shall be deemed guilty of unfair discrimination.

Mr. STERLING. While I am on my feet I want to call attention to the statement made by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] in regard to the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. I regret that the Senator from Delaware is not here; but I understand the Senator from Nevada to say that the Senator from Delaware had offered an amendment which permitted a review by the courts of the orders and decisions of the commission. I have what I think to be the only amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware on that subject, and I wish to call the attention of Senators to it.

On page 21, strike out lines 15 to 22, inclusive, and insert:

If any corporation fails or neglects to obey any order of the commission while the same is in effect, the commission, or any person for whose benefit such order was made, may file in the district court of the United States within any district where the method in question was used, or where such corporation is located or carries on business, a petition setting forth briefly the grounds on which relief should be granted the petitioner and the order of the commission in the premises. Such suits in the district courts of the United States shall proceed in all respects like other causes or actions, except that on the trial of such cause or action the findings and order of the commission shall be prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated, and except that the petitioner shall not be liable for costs in the district court nor for costs at any subsequent stage of the proceeding, unless they accrue upon his appeal. If the petitioner shall finally prevail, he shall be allowed a reasonable attorney fee, to be taxed and collected as a part of the costs of the suit. All petitions for the enforcement of an order of the commission under this section shall be filed in the district court of the United States within one year from the date of the order, and not after. And said court is hereby authorized to enter such judgment, order, or decree as may be appropriate in such cause or action.

It will be seen that under the amendment of the Senator from Delaware no relief whatever is given to the party or the corporation against whom the order is made. He has no right under this to seek a review by the court. If this amendment were adopted, there would then be no question whatever but that the court would have no power to review on the application of a person against whom the order was made. Under the principle that the expression of the one excludes the other, any other proceeding by the court than a review of the order on the application of the Government or on the application of the party in whose behalf it was made could not be had.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish to ask the Senator from Nevada in relation to the statement he made a few minutes ago. If I understood him correctly, he said that his position was based upon this, that inasmuch as the Constitution gives Congress the power to regulate commerce among the States, Congress may authorize an administration commission to regulate commerce, provided it lays down the rule within which the commission shall act. The Senator from Nevada states that this bill does provide a definite rule within which they shall decide what unfair competition is. I should like him to state what that rule is.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state that the phrase "unfair competition" has both an economic and a legal significance.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Which does the Senator think the commission is bound to follow, or both?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The legal significance, and the legal significance is the same as the economic significance. This matter has been discussed now for 20 years. There is hardly an economic writer who has not spoken of unfair competition as expressing something else than the mere offense of passing over, to which it was originally confined. There is hardly a court that has acted in any large trust case that has not used the words "unfair competition" as words of perfectly ascertainable meaning. Those words have been used in not only carefully considered decisions of courts but in decrees themselves.

I do not profess to be either able or willing to stand here and answer every possible conundrum that may be proposed to me in possible cases arising under this phrase, with all kinds of fine distinctions, and so forth. All I say is that we have laid down the rule and we propose a tribunal to administer that rule, and that is the regulation of commerce under the Constitution. That regulation can not take away any man's right of property; it can not confiscate it; nor can the power be exercised except within the limits of the authority. The courts can intervene at any moment to protect either property against confiscation or an individual against an unauthorized act by a commission of this kind.

Now, we can, if we choose, go further and give a right of review; and that is being considered by the Senate and it will be presented in various amendments. That review may be confined to the law, and it may cover both the law and the facts.

I was greatly amused with the facetious speech of the Senator from Connecticut. It was amusing to us all. Of course he could hardly be serious in the exaggerated view that there is no difference between a criminal prosecution and a proceeding in equity by injunction; that there is no difference between a proceeding which lands a man in jail as the result of an indictment and a proceeding under which the defendant can absolutely protect himself from going to jail by obeying the judgment of the court given under the Constitution and the law.

So, from the terrors that the Senator depicts of criminal proceedings and landing in jail all citizens of the Republic are quite exempt. This power has been exercised by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the power of making an order to cease and desist. These orders have been enforced by the court. There have been no terrors connected with the proceedings, except perhaps of evildoers who might finally land, through really criminal proceedings, in jail, just as the man whom we seek to control in these practices could finally land in jail through a perfection of monopoly.

Mr. President, the business man of this country has no fear of this method of inquiry. He wants a tribunal of experts consisting of lawyers and economists and men trained in business to act in judgment upon business matters.

The boards of trade of this country have been almost unanimous in their indorsement of such a proposal, with a full knowledge of all of the provisions presented to them by the National Chamber of Commerce through a referendum. These chambers have been debating this matter for months, and the demand has largely arisen from them. They know what they want. The business men have no fear of such a tribunal, nor have they fear of any substantial injustice being done.

Had we yielded to the terrors which the Senator describes we would have never organized an Interstate Commerce Commission. Had we yielded to such terrors we never would have passed the antitrust act. If such terrors are to control, we never will pass any adequate measure that will meet the evils that are apparent to all, of practices in embryo which finally ripen into monopoly.

We are merciful to these men who are thus offending against good morals in business by checking them in their mad career, and we are merciful to the business men of the country when we give them a tribunal in which, without expense to them, they can meet their giant opponents and secure administrative justice.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I had hoped to get some light from the Senator as to what is the accurate definition and rule that he has laid down for this commission to delimit its powers with.

The Senator has referred to my facetious speech. I will do him the compliment to say that I consider his to have exceeded mine in that line. When the Senator says, in answer to the inquiry of another Senator as to what the thing in this bill which is declared to be unlawful is, he is met with the response that the chairman of this committee does not care to stand here to answer conundrums and to go into the refinements of distinction, and flippantly waves his hand and waves them all into thin air.

If Congress is declaring something to be unlawful, the people of the country are entitled to know what we mean by that language, and the Senator from Nevada does not know. If he does, he failed to state it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I have stated again and again that in my judgment this phrase covers all practices——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not yield to the Senator at this time.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Against morals and——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator must not interrupt me, as I did not interrupt him.

The Senator says that "unfair competition" means what it means in law and what it means in economics. I do not know what economists say about unfair competition, neither do I know whether they agree in what they say about it, and I do not believe the commission who are sitting in judgment as between two corporations of this country, one of which is charging the other with having gotten some of its business which it otherwise would have gotten by unfair methods of competition, would get the slightest illumination from these anonymous economists who exist in the Senator's mind. Economists do not make the statutes and they do not make the laws of this country, neither do magazine writers nor charitable institutions nor boomers of particular cults or factions; but the Congress of the United States is declaring something or other to be unlawful here, and it is alleged that the business men of this country are demanding that legislation. Now, I deny it.

Mr. President, I have been a member of this committee for three or four years. I sat for months in 1911 under a resolution introduced by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], and we took testimony to the extent of three volumes as large as that [exhibiting], which may be had by any Senator, as to whether any additional legislation was necessary or not to enforce the Sherman law in this country. There appeared before our committee representatives of pretty nearly every class of people in the country—if it is proper to speak of classes of people in this country—representatives, I will say, of employers and employees and leading lawyers and presidents of chambers of commerce, writers and thinkers on these subjects.

Now, what legislation did the great mass of those people demand of Congress? They did not one of them ask that any statute should be passed prohibiting anybody from doing anything. They said that they wanted remedial legislation. They wanted legislation so that they could know what they could do without violating the Sherman law. Mr. George Perkins came here, and his testimony is all extant and is very informing. I am speaking now simply from memory—I have not read it lately—but Mr. George Perkins, who believes in large units and large corporations and the economies that he says are produced by large units in the industries of this country and in others, and who says that they are necessary to compete with the similar units into which our foreign competitors are organized, wants something that will allow combinations without danger of prosecution under the Sherman law.

I have no doubt the Senators here from the coal-producing States know what the situation is in their States as to the soft-coal industry. The former Senator from West Virginia, Senator Watson, who was a member of our committee, brought on here from West Virginia, that great coal-producing State, representatives of both the large and small coal operators, and they swore before the committee that the condition in that industry was something awful. What they were complaining of was cutthroat competition. They said that the resources in the soft-coal fields were being ruined by the way that industry was compelled to be conducted under the present straightjacket Sherman antitrust law. They said that only the richest mines could be operated, and the competition was so fierce that only that coal could be taken out which was the cream of the mine; that the rest of it was abandoned; that they were skimming the cream and leaving millions upon millions of tons of coal in mines under this unscientific method of cutthroat competition, which could probably not be recovered hereafter, whereas if they were allowed to have a trade commission which would have authority to set the seal of approval of this Government upon an agreement that those otherwise competing coal miners and coal companies might make with each other to stop this wasteful competition, to fix the price of coal higher, it would result in a great economic operation of their coal properties, that the supply would last longer, and that they could all make a little something, instead of only the richest miners or those who had the richest holdings making it all and leaving the rest abandoned.

That was the burden of the refrain of nine-tenths of the expert witnesses who appeared before our committee, and that was the kind of trade commission they were demanding, as they described it, a trade commission that would help business. There has been nobody here demanding a trade commission as an additional scourge to business. No business man has come on here and said that he thought a commission of the Government that should act as a Pinkerton police department or a secret-service agency or a mere smelling committee would help anybody's business.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do, for a question.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Does the Senator recall that the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, which is affiliated with all the boards of trade and commerce of the country, has recently had a referendum which presented this bill with all its details, and that upon that referendum the boards of trade and chambers of commerce by a very large majority declared for this measure, and particularly for the provision relating to unfair competition?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No, I do not; and I deny that it is the fact.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Is the Senator also aware that the Merchant Retailers' Association sent a telegram yesterday, which was put into the RECORD, urging the Senate particularly to adhere to section 5 of the bill?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I heard the Senator have a telegram read from somebody, I think in St. Louis or some western city, which was immediately exposed by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], as I recall, who said he had received a similar telegram from a similar association in his State and that they were acting under an entire misapprehension of the situation, as I think they are.

I will say when I say that——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator from Minnesota indicated that the dissatisfaction with the proposed law was that the provision was confined to corporations and was not extended to individuals.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Perhaps if it covers corporations it should be extended to individuals. But that is another question. I am saying that what the Chamber of Commerce of the United States—if that is the institution that the Senator refers to as the national chamber—did was to poll their constituents around this country, and they sent to them a copy of the House Clayton bill as a sample. That is my recollection about it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. They sent a referendum also for the Senate bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Now, there appeared within a day or two of that same occurrence—and I will read it to the Senate later from the testimony, that there may be no mistake about it—some business gentlemen who said they represented I do not know how many millions, over one hundred, I do not know, but several hundred million dollars invested in industries in Indiana.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. Is it not possible that these business men may not know what is for their own good, and that it is wise for us to administer such remedy as we think is best for them?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think we ought to act according to the duties and powers of our office. If we are not fit to legislate, we ought to go home and let the business men do the legislating and let us do the business. Probably we would both do better or worse than we do now; I do not know which. But these men from Indiana went to the White House, and they were told by the President that their troubles were purely psychological and they ought to go home and brace up and talk cheerful and chipper, and then everybody else would be chipper. Then they came over to us. The testimony will show what they said. I asked one of them who testified if he and his friends were in favor of a trade commission. He replied that they thought it would be a great thing. I said, "What trade commission bill are you in favor of?" He did not know. I asked him if he thought those whom he represented when they voted had known what was contained in the bill which they said they were in favor of, and he said he did not think they did. I then took the Newlands trade commission bill and read to him what the commission was authorized to do in the inspecting and investigating line, and asked him if that was the kind of a trade commission these business men had petitioned for; and he said, "Oh, no; that is not what we want at all." "Well," I said, "do you not think it would help business to have that?" "No," he said; "I do not." Said I, "Do you think it would restore business confidence if Congress should adjourn?" "I certainly do," he said. Well, that gentleman did not think——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator will recall that three associations were represented there, I think, one from Ohio, one from Indiana, and another from Illinois; and whilst one of the gentlemen did respond as the Senator has indicated, the Senator will recollect that the others responded favorably, and that one of them, from Chicago, a very intelligent man, declared that it would be impossible to attempt to define the various trade practices that ought to come under the condemnation of the law, and he said if there were 20 of these practices to-day, and they were forbidden expressly, there would be 20 more invented to-morrow just as effective.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I agree to that; and I agree that that gentleman was in just the same position of absolutely guiltless knowledge of what this language means as the Senator from Nevada is in; but the Senator from Nevada is so anxious to get through the Newlands Federal trade commission bill, or the title of it, that he does not care what is in the bill, if he can only get it through and have the framework established.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is this the Newlands Federal trade commission bill?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think, if you tried to take that title away from it, you would have trouble.

Mr. GALLINGER. I read this, which bears the signature of my colleague:

Moreover, we propose to elect in the place of Senator GALLINGER this fall another man who shares my views on these subjects—Congressman STEVENS, who is the author of the trade commission bill now pending in the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. As between such high authorities, I would not know how to decide.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The statement read by the Senator from New Hampshire is probably confined to section 5 of the bill. It is a fact that the origin of section 5 is a bill introduced by Mr. STEVENS, of New Hampshire, but I will state further that the very first trade commission bill which I offered in the Senate over three years ago provided against "unfair competition."

Mr. GALLINGER. The junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] did not confine his statement to section 5, his exact words being:

Congressman STEVENS, who is the author of the trade commission bill now pending in the Senate.

I do not know who is the author of this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is that a letter?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is from a letter; yes.

Mr. STONE. What difference does the authorship of the bill make?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not know that it makes any difference who is the author of this bill. The Senator from Nevada, as he says, has had the honor of introducing a great many bills on this subject. No one of them has been like any other one of them, but they have all been trade commission bills, and they have all provided for another Government commission. Nobody knows who is the author of this bill. It is a composite production. It does not proceed upon any particular theory that is coherent or consistent. In section 5——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the Senator is quite correct in stating that it is "a composite production." It was very effectively amended by the Interstate Commerce Committee during the last Congress, when the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] was chairman of that committee. It was only tentatively amended at that time, it is true, and never perfected with a view to its report, for it was not reported. That committee reported no particular bill, but simply made a report covering the general principles of legislation which it recommended; but, among other things, it recommended a trade commission bill. The bill which that committee considered was a bill which had been introduced by myself in 1911, and I have to say that I was very much indebted to some of the Republican members of that committee for valuable suggestions in regard to the bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, we did secure the elimination of some objectionable features in the bill, but the Senator from Nevada has stated his views in the written report he has made upon this bill, and in remarks upon his previous bills, as well as on the pending bill, and I should like now to have a little time to give a few views of mine in a more or less connected way.

Mr. STONE. Does the Senator desire to go on this afternoon?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am perfectly willing to continue my remarks from day to day or week to week at any time, at the convenience of the Senator.

Mr. STONE. Or from month to month?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Or from month to month; yes. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. STONE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 37 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, July 17, 1914, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, July 16, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Thy spirit, O God our Father, be upon us to uphold, sustain, and guide us in every act looking to the larger application of justice, that every man, woman, and child throughout the length and breadth of the land may have an equal chance to live, grow, and enjoy the fruits of their own labors; that wrongs may be righted, discords cease, and every virtue encouraged; that brotherly love may have its sway—each for all and all for each. In the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the credentials of Hon. W. O. MULKEY, elected a Member of Congress from the third district of Alabama, are on the Speaker's table, and I ask that the oath of office be administered to him.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the gentleman's credentials and finds them correct.

Thereupon Mr. MULKEY, accompanied by Mr. UNDERWOOD, appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office prescribed by law.

PAYMENTS UNDER RECLAMATION PROJECTS.

The SPEAKER. By order of the House, in effect this is Calendar Wednesday, and the bill that came over from yesterday is the bill S. 4628, the irrigation bill. Before going into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, the Chair, at the request of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], announces that as soon as the House adjourns this afternoon there will be a Democratic caucus held in the Hall for the purpose of electing Members to fill vacancies on committees.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, before going into Committee of the Whole, I want to inquire if we can not agree upon a limit for general debate?

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman any suggestion to make?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I am willing to agree to one hour on a side, or two hours on a side, if necessary. I will ask unanimous consent that general debate on this bill be limited to four hours, one half to be controlled by myself and the other half by the ranking minority member of the committee, Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado, pending going into Committee of the Whole, asks unanimous consent that general debate on the irrigation bill be limited to four hours, one half to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID].

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. FOSTER. I want to inquire if debate will be restricted to the subject of the bill?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I am perfectly willing—in fact, would be glad—to so limit it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this is one of the most important bills that has been before Congress for a long time. I do not know how much debate gentlemen desire to have upon it, but in view of the fact that the two gentlemen who are to control the time are both in favor of the bill—and I have no objection to that—I do not think the time ought now to be limited.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that I am perfectly willing to give those who are opposed to the bill one-half of the time.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman would not be able to carry that into effect if the time was limited and those opposed to the bill wanted two hours.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I do not think they would make any unreasonable request. If those who are opposed to the bill want half of my two hours, I will give it to them. Personally I would like to have less general debate than that if we could agree upon it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make this observation: The debate, as I understand it, is to be on the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I hope so, if we can agree to it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I presume that the gentleman from Illinois and some others, who may think as he does about it, may want to talk when the bill is under consideration under the five-minute rule. I am opposed to the amendment of the committee, which strikes out section 16 from the bill. I want to discuss it at some length. I do not care to discuss it in Committee of the Whole under general debate when there is no one here. I would rather see the time for general debate limited, and then have an understanding that under the five-minute rule there shall be considerable latitude in discussing the different provisions of the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I would be very glad to agree to that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I want to say that I think this bill is a very important one. It does not affect my own constituency, but I realize the importance of the bill to the western country. I am in hopes that the bill will be modified to some extent and then passed. I think the bill ought to be amended to some extent before it becomes a law, and then it ought to pass.

I have no objection to giving the settlers 20 years instead of 10, but there are some other provisions in the bill that I would like to see changed. But what I wish to say is this: I do not think we will accomplish anything by agreeing to four hours of general debate to-day. I believe it will be absolutely wasted. I would like to see the debate on this bill limited to two hours, with the understanding of gentlemen in charge of it that we will have a reasonable latitude for debate under the five-minute rule. I do not think it is necessary to make an agreement as to that, for the House always lives up to a gentleman's agreement. Let us have some latitude under the five-minute rule, and two hours of general debate. I will ask the gentleman to modify his request to that extent.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to make this observation: There are many Members of the House who are not at all familiar with the provisions of the reclamation law, and they can not well become familiar with the provisions of the reclamation law by the discussion which would be had under the five-minute rule. There ought to be some discussion in general debate on the general provisions of the bill, in order that Members may be informed as to the entire matter, before we begin the discussion of the provisions in the bill.

There ought to be latitude of debate under the five-minute rule; personally I should like to make a general statement of 20 or 25 minutes, as to the law and the workings of the law and the reasons why it is necessary for these modifications. That can not well be done under the five-minute rule.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. What does the gentleman from Wyoming suggest?

Mr. MONDELL. I think if we make an agreement at all it should be for four hours; that would be satisfactory, with the hope that the discussion be confined to the bill. Of course if, before that time, gentlemen get through with the discussion on the bill, the debate ought to close.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Iowa that he understands the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] makes it conditional that he will object unless the debate is confined to the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the Speaker hardly got my idea——

The SPEAKER. The Chair wants to get it. The Chair wants to ask the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID] a question of his own. Both the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID] are for this bill. The Chair does not know that there is a soul in the House who is against it, but it is a wretched, bad practice to have all the time on any bill controlled by one side. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] says he is willing to yield one-half of his time to anybody who is opposed to the bill. Is the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID] of the same frame of mind?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. I think that would be a very good disposition of the time. We might select some one who was representing the opposition, and let him control the time on that side.

The SPEAKER. No; the Chair does not suggest that.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. That is, to sublet it. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] and I can divide the time; but, as far as I am concerned, I have thought of letting some one who is opposed to the bill parcel out the time to those who are opposed to it.

The SPEAKER. The reason the Chair made the remark is that he has seen the time here when it was almost impossible for any Member to get any time against a bill, because the proponents of the bill monopolized the whole thing.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID] will yield, will he not, time to the opponents of the bill?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. That is satisfactory to me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] asks unanimous consent——

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is a bill of very great importance to my people, and I would not like to give unanimous consent unless it is understood that I can have 30 minutes in which to discuss this bill in general debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests to the gentleman that he negotiate with the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] or the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID].

Mr. MANN. As far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing that the time be divided equally between the two gentlemen, and take chances on that; but I am not willing, under these conditions, to agree to closing general debate at this time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. MANN. It will save time to have an understanding that the time be controlled by the two gentlemen.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate be controlled one-half by the gentleman from Nebraska and one-half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate be controlled half and half by himself and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID]. Is there objection?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I want to make an additional request—that the debate be confined to the bill.

Mr. MANN. I shall object to that, although I hope gentlemen will start in with a lot of other debate; but somebody might want time for something else.

The SPEAKER. You had better leave out that condition, then.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. All right, then. I will withdraw that latter part of the request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that one half of the time for general debate be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID]. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Reserving the right to object, the request should provide that these two gentlemen be required to yield half the time——

The SPEAKER. They have already agreed to, and the Chair will take their word for it.

Mr. MADDEN. I think the House ought to have something to say about it.

The SPEAKER. Of course. The Chair thinks that, too. Does the gentleman add that?

Mr. MANN. I think that is unnecessary.

Mr. MADDEN. Then, I will withdraw the suggestion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws it. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (S. 4628) extending the period for payment of reclamation projects, and for other purposes, with Mr. FLOOD of Virginia in the chair.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say to the House that in view of the statement of the Speaker that there is a notice out for a Democratic caucus in this room immediately after the adjournment of to-day's session, to fill some vacancies in committees, I will notify the Members that I will ask the committee to rise about 5 o'clock this afternoon. Will the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID] now consume some of his time?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Yes, Mr. Chairman. I will yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, there is a general desire among those favorable to this legislation to consume as little time as possible in general debate. I certainly share in that desire and feeling in regard to the matter. I should take no time at all in general debate if it were not for the fact that there are quite a number of gentlemen in the House who were not here at the time of the passage of the reclamation law, who are not familiar with that law and its working, and it has occurred to me that a general statement of facts and figures with regard to the operations under the reclamation law might be helpful in the consideration of the measure under the five-minute rule.

It was my good fortune to belong to and be a member of the unofficial committee of 17, representing the Western States and Territories, that drafted the original reclamation act. I was a member of the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands that considered the act in committee. I had the honor of reporting the bill to the House and had charge of the debate, and President Roosevelt was kind enough to hand to me for my State the pen with which the act was signed. I was also the author of the legislation under which a loan of $20,000,000 was made to the reclamation fund. I live in the part of the country in which these projects are being developed, and have kept in close touch with that development, not only in my own State, but throughout the West. I have personally visited many of the projects under construction, and think I am fairly well informed as to the conditions under which this great work has developed, and the present situation with regard to the projects, both from the engineering standpoint and the standpoint of the men who are trying to conquer the desert, and make homes in the wilderness under these great projects.

PROMISED BY THE REPUBLICAN PLATFORM.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say that while this is not in any way a party measure, and should not be so considered, for it has had and has support on both sides of the House, gentlemen on the Republican side of the House should not forget that in the passage of this legislation, as in the passage of some other legislation that has been presented by our friends on the other side, we are simply carrying out Republican platform pledges. The last Republican national convention made this declaration:

> We favor the continuance of the policy of the Government with regard to the reclamation of arid lands. For the encouragement of the speedy settlement and improvement of such lands we favor an amendment to the law which will reasonably extend the time within which the cost of any reclamation project may be repaid by the landowners under it.

So that this Congress, controlled by a Democratic majority, has in this legislation acted in accordance with the platform pledges of the Republican Party, confessing, of course, as in many other matters, that the only wise legislation that can be had is legislation that has been recommended and pledged by our party.

EXTENSION OF RECLAMATION PAYMENTS.

Mr. Chairman, the reclamation law of June 17, 1902, authorized the Secretary of the Interior to make examinations and surveys for, and to locate and construct, irrigation works for the storage, diversion, and development of waters for the irrigation of arid lands in certain western public-land States to which, by subsequent enactment, the State of Texas was added. The funds for this work were to be derived from the proceeds of the sale of public lands. These funds proving inadequate for the completion of projects which have been undertaken as rapidly as the public interest seemed to demand, the act of June 25, 1910, provided for advances from the Treasury to the reclamation fund of sums not to exceed in the aggregate $20,000,000.

The receipts from the sale of public lands flowing into the reclamation fund up to the end of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, amounted to $81,504,919.82, to which is to be added the available loan of $20,000,000. The expenditure on account of all projects and undertakings up to April 30, 1914, amounted to $86,374,066.01. Twenty-seven primary projects have been undertaken. The estimated area of the irrigable lands under these projects when completed is 2,447,966 acres. Of this area 1,015,064 acres were public lands and 1,432,902 acres are in private or State ownership.

PRESENT STATE OF PROJECTS.

The Reclamation Service is at this time prepared to furnish water for irrigation to 1,261,704 acres, of which 28,732 is public land which on the 1st of May was unentered and approximately 50,000 acres are State lands unirrigated. It is estimated that 886,967 acres of the lands for which water is available are actually being irrigated the present season. Taking from the total of the lands for which water is available the public lands still unentered and the 50,000 acres of State lands leaves 296,014 acres included in farms occupied by owners or entrymen which have not yet been actually brought under cultivation. It ordinarily requires from three to five years from the beginning of irrigation for the owner or entryman to get all of his land under water and cultivation; therefore this difference between the acreage of land occupied and the acreage cultivated will eventually be wiped out as to these lands.

PAYMENTS DUE.

On the 27 primary projects above referred to there are 9,645 users subject to building charges, in addition to which there are 1,263 persons having old or preexisting rights not subject to building charges, but which are subject to operation and maintenance charges. Up to the date of the last report available there has been returned to the reclamation fund in the payment of building charges $2,915,303, and on account of operation and maintenance charges there has been paid $1,855,141, or a total of $4,770,444. The reclamation law provides for the return to the reclamation fund of the estimated cost of constructions in 10 years.

Very soon after the first payments became due it became apparent that, owing to a variety of circumstances and conditions, entrymen and owners would not be able to meet their payments if they were divided into 10 equal annual installments. The Secretary of the Interior therefore, by regulation, provided for a system of graduated payments, beginning with a sum considerably less than one-tenth of the total charge and gradually increasing in amount so as to cover the entire building charge in 10 years. On a considerable number of projects, at least, this arrangement might have proved permanently satisfactory and landowners and entrymen might have been able to meet these payments had conditions been as favorable as was anticipated, and particularly had the cost per acre remained as low as was originally expected or estimated.

FORMER ESTIMATES OF COST.

When the reclamation law passed a cost of $25 an acre for a water right was, in most parts of the arid West, considered high, and the original estimates of the Reclamation Service were even less than that as to some of the projects. For instance, on the Minidoka project in Idaho and the Truckee-Carson project in Nevada the original estimate was $22 an acre; on the Huntley project in Montana $30 an acre; on the Carlsbad project in New Mexico $31 per acre. The actual cost on these projects will run from $40 to at least $55 per acre, and on some of the projects of considerable area the construction cost will be upward of $65 an acre; on a few in the neighborhood of $100 per acre.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. What is the reason for that tremendous discrepancy?

Mr. MONDELL. I propose to discuss that. If I do not go into it sufficiently in detail, the gentleman may interrupt me a moment later.

CAUSES OF INCREASED COST.

These increases of cost arise from a variety of causes, which in the limited time I have for the discussion of the matter I can not go into in detail. But in addition to these increased costs are a variety of causes not fully realized at the time the reclamation law was passed, which render it difficult for any landowner or entryman to meet his payments in 10 years, and utterly impossible for the owner or entryman of limited means, who most needs a home, to do so. On many of the projects—in fact, nearly all of them—the cost of clearing, leveling, and preparing the land for the growth of crops has been greater than anticipated. The cost of the necessary buildings and other improvements has been greater than was calculated. Furthermore, on many of the projects it has required a longer time than was expected to bring these wild lands, lacking in vegetable mold or humus, to grow the kind of crops which would bring the best return. In some localities unexpected seepage and waterlogging has occurred, which, though it has been or will be remedied by drainage, for the time being deprives the owner or entryman of the full use of his land.

I have not discussed the reasons for the increased cost of construction which, perhaps, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] had in mind. That arose from a variety of causes. It arose very largely from the very general increase and advance in the cost of material and in the wages of labor about the time the reclamation law went into effect. The eight-hour provision of the law also had some effect. It also came about by reason of the fact that the reclamation engineers, in the first instance, based their estimates very largely on private construction. Mr. Chairman, it is notorious that Government construction costs more than private construction. I do not mean to say that it costs the Government any more to get the same amount of work done, to secure the same results, than it does a private individual, but it is necessary, apparently, under Government construction, Government supervision, to be more thorough than it is often considered necessary to be in this class of construction by private enterprise. For one thing the Government engineers feel compelled to require the contractor to finish his work better, perhaps, than as a practical proposition it is essential it should be done. The gentleman realizes how an engineer of the Reclamation Service, like an Army engineer on river and harbor work, would be subject to criticism if he allowed the contractor to leave the work with an unfinished and slovenly appearance, although the work might for practical purposes be perfect. A private contractor could let a contract with a view of having the work completed without what they call a "sandpaper finish," and have the work done more cheaply, and possibly in the long run it would be just as good. I do not think we ought to criticize Government engineers because of the necessity, as they understand it, of finishing work perfectly. Further, a private constructor may figure and believe that he can get along with wood structures or relatively light or temporary structures for a part of his work. The Government engineer feels that he would be subject to criticism if he did not build all of his work practically for all time. The result is that we use concrete and stone almost exclusively for this work, for turnouts, and for the minor structures, as well as the larger structures, with the result that the cost is higher than was anticipated, based as it was largely on construction not so permanent in character, not so well finished.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. Aside from the causes the gentleman has given, it struck me, from the fact that he said the original estimates were $25 an acre and in some cases they had reached as high as $65 an acre, that possibly some unusual physical obstacle had been met with. Is not that true?

Mr. MONDELL. That is true in some cases, and the gentleman understands this, that in some cases the increase of cost has been due to unexpected seepage and necessity for drainage. A project in my State has been increased in acre cost $5 or $6 on account of the necessity of constructing a complete drainage system, and a drainage system. I will say to my friend, that could not have been anticipated by the best irrigation engineers at the time the project was undertaken, for the country has every indication and appearance of a territory that would be naturally perfectly drained. The engineers, not being able to look down below the surface, were unable to determine as to conditions that no one anticipated, which necessitated drainage at considerable cost. That is true on many of the projects.

Mr. MURDOCK. What was the cause where the cost has reached $65 an acre? Was that one of those cases of unforeseen seepage?

Mr. MONDELL. The projects on which very low estimates were made were the first projects undertaken. On some of the projects more recently undertaken the estimated price was $50 or $60 an acre at the beginning. They are more difficult; they were not the character of projects which were anticipated to be undertaken as the first projects when the law was passed. They were undertaken later because it was believed that the land values were enough to justify the expenditure of that amount. For instance, on one project in Idaho we have spent $34 per acre for the whole project for storage alone. In addition to all the cost of the construction of the ditches the storage works alone lay that enormous cost upon the land, and yet I think that no one who knows the situation of the Boise Valley will doubt, if not the propriety of undertaking that work at this time, at least the fact that the work will be paid for.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman dealt only with the construction cost when he mentioned $25 to $65 per acre?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. Is there an original land-value cost in addition?

Mr. MONDELL. There is no land value that the Government is interested in primarily for this work. These lands are of two classes. They are either privately owned lands—I have just given figures of the two classes—they are either privately owned lands, which are pledged to the repayment of the expenditure before the project is undertaken, or they are public lands which are entered under the provisions of the homestead law with the obligations of the irrigation law added thereto.

Mr. MOORE. Whether private or public lands, they come under the reclamation law?

Mr. MONDELL. They come under the reclamation law, because there are public lands on all projects and practically all projects have some private lands.

Mr. MOORE. I asked the question with regard to the cost to ascertain if the gentleman could tell what the price of the land to the farmer would be when it was in a state of cultivation.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, in some cases farmers, whose lands are to be irrigated, did spend large sums of money attempting to irrigate them before the Reclamation Service took charge, and in some cases as much as $50 an acre had been spent on the lands before the Reclamation Service took up the project. Of course such owners must have laid upon that original investment whatever is the burden of the reclamation charge. In addition to that the reclamation law requires a subdivision of privately owned lands and will not allow anyone to secure a water right for more than 160 acres, so that the owner of large areas must subdivide and sell the excess. On some projects the excess amount is sold for a considerable sum. On most of the projects in the North the selling price has been comparatively low, but on the Salt River project, for instance, they have sold lands as high as $80 an acre, perhaps more, in addition to which must be the burden of the reclamation charge.

Mr. MOORE. If it costs $25 to $65 an acre, taking the extreme figures which the gentleman gave, to prepare the land for cultivation, $80 an acre would be a fair selling price?

Mr. MONDELL. Twenty-five dollars to sixty-five dollars. Does the gentleman mean the cost of the land ready for cultivation; is that what he has in mind?

Mr. MOORE. That I understood to be the construction cost.

Mr. MONDELL. That is the construction cost.

Mr. CARR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. CARR. The gentleman has stated that the amount of money that has been appropriated or received from the sale of public lands has been about $81,000,000.

Mr. MONDELL. Up to last June, a year ago.

Mr. CARR. A further appropriation of $20,000,000 has been made which would bring the total amount up to $101,000,000.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARR. Now, having already expended more than $86,000,000 in this project, the Commissioner of the Reclamation Service testified before the Committee on Appropriations that the probable cost on the completion of the 3,000,000 acres of land now in progress of irrigation would amount to about $165,000,000, or an average of $55 an acre. And what I wanted to ask the gentleman, if he knows, is whether the amount that will probably be received in the future from the sale of public lands will be sufficient to complete these projects?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, the gentleman asks me for an expression of opinion which might or might not be valuable; it will all depend upon what the income from the sale of public lands is. If the income from the sale of public lands is large enough, yes. If it decreases and diminishes, no; but the gentleman is not entirely accurate in his figures as to the estimate of the total cost of these primary projects. The last estimate which I have here is $149,051,407. Of course, it is a question that can not very well be known by any of us at this time just where we are going under this fund. If we can receive into the fund $10,000,000 a year these projects can be carried on and extended possibly as rapidly as it is necessary to carry them on, although the people who live in the vicinity of the projects would very much prefer to have their construction expedited, but that is a matter that we can not decide at this time here in connection with this discussion.

Mr. CARR. Does the gentleman recall the acreage of the land irrigated which is now water-logged?

Mr. MONDELL. No; no one knows the exact acreage, but it is not very great in the aggregate and is being reduced by drainage.

Mr. CARR. I recall the commissioner testified that these projects did not take into contemplation the clearing of these lands of their water-logged condition.

Mr. MONDELL. I am inclined to think the gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. CARR. Let me ask the gentleman this question——

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I want to answer that proposition. There were some rather loose statements made in connection with that situation, and the figures of actual irrigable lands which I have given are the figures after all nonirrigable lands are eliminated, and the total that I have given of $149,051,000 is the sum for the complete construction of these projects, drainage included. So that the figure that is given includes the drainage.

Mr. CARR. You have already expended, according to your figures, $86,000,000.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. CARR. Now, the commissioner testifies it would take perhaps $165,000,000 to complete the project?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not agree that anyone in authority has testified that it will take $160,000,000 for the construction of the projects undertaken. It will take approximately $150,000,000. But I do not see that that really has anything to do with the discussion. And while I would like to yield to the gentleman, my time flies.

Mr. CARR. Three million acres?

Mr. MONDELL. Less than 3,000,000 acres. The fact that the cost is going to be so heavy before we get these lands all under irrigation is a very strong argument in favor of the extension of the payments.

EFFECT OF SUGAR DUTY ON PROJECTS.

While I do not want to inject into this discussion anything political in character, as that is never my disposition in any discussion, I can not properly refrain from referring to the effect of the policy relative to the sugar-beet industry inaugurated by the Underwood tariff bill on many of these lands. There are a number of projects whose lands are peculiarly adapted to the growing of sugar beets; in fact, most of them are adapted to that class of agricultural industry. With a duty on sugar sufficient to make the growing of sugar beets and the manufacture of beet sugar successful in this country, it was anticipated and logically expected that in a comparatively short time most of these projects would secure beet-sugar factories and the people engage to a considerable extent in the growing of sugar beets. This was a consummation devoutly to be wished and confidently looked forward to; for the sugar beet not only thrives well on most of these lands, but the cultivation of the beet enhances the value of the land for other crops. The presence of a beet-sugar factory furnishes employment for some months each year to a considerable number of persons, and the by-products of the factory are helpful to the dairying and stock-raising industries by furnishing a large amount of nutritious and fattening stock food.

While the reduction which has already taken place in the duty on sugar under the Underwood bill is probably not enough in itself, if that were the end of it, to render the sugar-beet industry impossible on these areas, the ultimate free trade in sugar, which the bill provides, if it should bring the reduction in the price of sugar which it was claimed it would, will render impossible the production of sugar from beets on these lands.

Of course, if the wiping out of the tariff does not produce a lower price for sugar, as the reduction of the tariff has not, it may be claimed that the beet-sugar industry would still be possible; but that view entirely overlooks the fact that under free sugar the importer could lower his price without loss long enough to bankrupt the American sugar producer and then raise it again. In this condition of uncertainty no one seriously contemplates or expects the erection of new beet-sugar factories. Leaving out of the discussion the question as to the wisdom, propriety, or advisability, from a national standpoint, of wiping out the tariff on sugar, the fact remains that as to these communities the Government has, since it made its original contract or offer with regard to the irrigation of their lands, adopted a policy which deprives them of an important source of income which they were justified in believing would be available to them.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAKER. What particular project is there where there has been any decrease in the acreage since the passage of the Underwood tariff bill?

Mr. MONDELL. The acreage of sugar beets?

Mr. RAKER. Yes. What project?

Mr. MONDELL. I am not fully informed as to the decrease of the acreage of sugar beets since the passage of the Underwood bill. I presume there has been, but I do not know as to that. But the gentleman knows, as I know, that sugar-beet enterprises that were projected for these areas before the passage of the Underwood bill have been entirely abandoned, and while there should have been a large increase of the amount of sugar beets grown there has been no increase of the acreage and there has probably been a considerable decrease. I know that in my own State we would probably have had one or two sugar-beet factories under the process of erection at this moment if it had not been for the passage of the Underwood bill. And that is true of Nevada, Colorado, Montana, as well as Wyoming.

Mr. ROBERTS of Nevada. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. ROBERTS of Nevada. Is it not a fact, in answer to the question of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], that in the State of Nevada, where the Truckee project is, one of the largest irrigation projects in the world, a sugar-beet factory was erected in 1910 and was running full blast, but has closed down and all the farmers have quit raising beets? It is as silent as the tomb to-day.

Mr. MONDELL. That is a pretty conclusive answer to my friend from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. KENT. Does the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] know what became of all those beet factories that were going to be built for the purpose of defeating the Underwood bill?

Mr. MONDELL. I did not understand the gentleman's inquiry.

Mr. KENT. What happened to all those beet factories that were going to be built for the purpose of defeating the Underwood bill?

Mr. MONDELL. I have not any knowledge of any beet factories that were to be built to defeat the Underwood bill, but I do know quite a bit concerning the sugar-beet factories that the Underwood bill defeated. I have positive personal knowledge that factories would have been undertaken but for the Underwood bill, and the gentleman from California knows it just as well as I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I hope the gentleman from Nebraska will give me a little more time. I have been interrupted a good deal.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. I will yield 20 minutes more to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. I thank the gentleman. I realize there is a great demand for time. I am discussing the matter——

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. CRAMTON. In reference to the inquiry of the gentleman from California [Mr. KENT], I would like to suggest that in my district, at the town of Pigeon, although a site had been selected and the building of a beet-sugar factory determined upon, and some of the material was on the ground when the Underwood law went into effect, the building of the factory has been abandoned.

Mr. MONDELL. The testimony of the gentleman from Michigan is in line with the facts that are known to us all.

I know that in my own State options had been taken on sites for factories, and contracts had been made or were in contemplation for fuel—natural gas—for use of the factories; but they were all abandoned at a considerable loss, the bonus being surrendered, as the result of the Underwood tariff bill. I did not suppose that anybody would be simple enough to deny that sort of thing.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. I want to make first a statement, and then ask a question.

Mr. MONDELL. Make it short.

Mr. RAKER. I observe that the gentleman mentions projects where contracts for improvements had been abandoned. Will the gentleman give the House information as to where on any of these projects it was contemplated to erect a sugar factory that was not erected because of the Underwood tariff bill?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, yes.

Mr. RAKER. Where?

Mr. MONDELL. The Shoshone project, Big Horn and Sheridan Counties, was a promising site for a factory; elsewhere too numerous to mention. Besides that, a factory closed down on the Truckee-Carson project. A factory was contemplated in the State of Montana, on the Clarkes Fork of the Missouri River—a beautiful, purling stream in the district represented by my handsome young friend from Montana [Mr. STOUT]—and they were practically ready to construct it, and that factory would have utilized beets from the Shoshone project. But of course they could not undertake to build the factory after the enactment of the Underwood bill.

Mr. CARR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. CARR. Will the gentleman state to the House whether there was anything else that could be raised on these projects?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; but they had good reason to believe that they would have the oportunity to raise sugar beets. If the gentleman wants to defend free sugar, he has a perfect right to do it. But if I were a Democrat and wanted to defend free sugar, I would defend it squarely and take the consequences. I would not attempt to blow hot and cold and to play fast and loose and pretend you could reduce the price of sugar so low that no one but a peon could make it, and then try to claim that American factories, paying high wages, could continue in business under those circumstances. It is preposterous, ridiculous, and illogical, and the gentleman ought to be ashamed of it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CARR. Does the gentleman say that the price of sugar has not been reduced?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, I am a man of family and a householder and a housekeeper, and I know that the price of sugar to the consumer has not come down; and I know, further, that the Sugar Trust has gained what the United States Treasury has lost by the reduction of the duty.

Mr. CARR. Has the price really come down?

Mr. MONDELL. I explained to the gentleman that so long as the importer has the power to reduce the price and can drop it without losing a cent he will do so as long and as often as it is necessary to put his competitor out of business, and only long enough to do that; and under those conditions no man with money to invest, no farmer with muscle to expend, is willing to go into an industry when he knows that after his investment shall have been made it can all be taken away from him.

Mr. STOUT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from Montana?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; I yield.

Mr. STOUT. I understood that the gentleman spoke of the contemplated construction of a factory on Clarkes Fork, Mont.?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. STOUT. Is it not a fact that they have been contemplating the construction of that factory for at least 10 or 12 years?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, no; not that long, because it is not that long ago that that region was in a position to raise beets enough to admit of the construction of a factory. The factory at Billings was constructed only about eight years ago.

Mr. STOUT. Make it eight years ago.

Mr. MONDELL. Then there were scarcely beets enough raised in the Yellowstone and on the Clarkes Fork Valleys to keep the Billings factory going, but as soon as sufficient acreage was obtained they began to discuss the building of a factory on Clarkes Fork; and a distinguished Democrat, a friend of mine and of the gentleman from Montana was down here during the consideration of the Underwood bill pleading with a Democratic Congress to save them from the destruction of their industry of raising sugar beets and their hope of a new factory.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. MONDELL. I do.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Is not the gentleman in favor of this bill?

Mr. MONDELL. I am, as the gentleman knows.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Does not the gentleman think that, as friends of the measure, as he and I are, that we ought not to indulge in this tariff talk? [Applause on the Democratic side.] Is not this measure in the interest of the West and in the interest of our constituents?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, I object to the periodical scoldings that come from that side of the House and to the lectures as to what I shall do and what I shall not do. In the first place, I did not discuss this as a political proposition at all. Sugar is going on the free list, and the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] who has just spoken knows just as well as I do that of the factories in his State some of them are closed and no new ones will be built.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Even if that were true, which it is not, what has that to do with this bill? I object to this cheap peanut politics being played and jeopardizing this important measure.

Mr. MONDELL. I am trying to call attention to the fact that these people went onto these projects and made these contracts with the understanding that——

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. No; I have not the time. I would like to say a word or two myself.

Mr. GORDON. I would like to know whom they made those contracts with.

Mr. MONDELL. Farmers went on to these projects and made these contracts with the Government with the understanding they were to pay so much per acre for water rights on lands that were valuable, most of them, for sugar-beet production—the best sugar-beet lands in the world. On some of those projects it is best to grow some sort of root crop at the beginning to bring the lands into condition for other crops. I say these people looked forward to sugar-beet production as one of the most certain sources of income. You take it away from them. You say you do it in the interest of the people. Stand by it, and have the courage of your convictions, and then help us to extend the terms of payment that these people are entitled to by reason of the fact that you have taken these opportunities away from them.

Mr. ROBERTS of Nevada. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ROBERTS of Nevada. I wanted to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that the gentlemen on the other side were playing politics when they asked the gentleman what factory had closed and what ones had not?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; that is the fact. I simply called attention to the facts as to the fiscal policy of their party and they get excited and say I am playing politics.

EXTENSION OF PERIOD OF PAYMENTS.

In view of the conditions which now confront and surround entrymen on these projects it is proposed to extend the period of payments from 10 to 20 years, and in doing so to make some changes in the reclamation law which are needed and essential to the successful carrying out and continuation of irrigation enterprises by the Government. On June 23, 1913, the Secretary of the Interior issued public notices under which he readjusted the payments on a number of projects. Under that readjustment there became due, and remains due at this time, the sum of $1,897,406 in building charges.

Mr. RAGSDALE. I desire to call attention to the fact that the gentlemen on the other side of the House are not listening to their distinguished orator. Many of them are engaged in conversation——

Mr. MANN. The statement is not true. What is the use of making it? I want that to go into the RECORD—that the statement is not true.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] does not yield. The gentleman from South Carolina is not in order.

Mr. MONDELL. I think it is about time that side of the House learned something about the rules of debate. They may not like the pointed arguments that are being made, but it is their duty to keep silent. The frothy and windy gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE] can speak in his own time and make his own arguments if he has any which he desires to make.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MONDELL. I do not yield, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Nor am I asking the gentleman to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina is not in order. The gentleman from Wyoming has the floor.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I rose for a proper purpose, believing myself to be in order——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that he is not in order unless the floor is yielded him by the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Anticipating action by Congress on the subject of payments the Secretary of the Treasury refrained from making demands for payments due until he can readjust under the new law. And my own opinion is that the passage of this law on this important matter will not reduce the income into the reclamation fund in the next year or two, but that, as a matter of fact, it will have the opposite effect, because under the terms of the bill on a number of projects the payment of 5 per cent will be required where no payments for building charges have heretofore been made. The probability is that the adjustments under the 20-year law will not for the coming year materially reduce the total amount that will come in; but it will readjust them so as to take the load from those who are least able to pay and place a part of the burden on those who are better able to pay it.

I understand that no final figures have been made as to the immediate effect in the matter of payments under the plan, but inasmuch as on a number of projects the payments will not be very materially reduced below the payments now due, and other projects not now paying building charges will have the building charge fixed and the notice issued under which the initial payment is to be made, my own impression is, although that impression is, I admit, rather in the nature of a guess, that the payments for the coming fiscal year will not fall far below, if, as a matter of fact, they do not equal or exceed the amounts now due under the old plan.

EARNEST, HONEST, AND DESERVING FARMERS.

Approximately 10,000 honest, earnest American farmers, most of them with wives and families, have gone upon these lands at the invitation of the Government. They have not only encountered the difficulties and the hardships incident to pioneer life, but added to that have been the peculiar trials and difficulties which surround irrigation development, the winning of arid lands from their aridity, the building of homes and communities in arid and desert places. The soil has not always yielded as quickly or as generously as was expected. The markets have not always developed as promptly or favorably as was anticipated. The hope and expectation of at least one profitable crop has been taken from them by a change in our tariff policy. Added to all this has been the very considerable increase above what was estimated, promised, or fixed as to the cost of the water rights per acre. In this condition of affairs we feel fully justified in asking on behalf of these good people a liberal policy in the matter of payments. Ultimately these projects on which approximately $86,000,000 has been expended will cost, when fully completed and the full acreage is brought in, nearly $150,000,000, but this will all be repaid eventually under the plan we propose. When you take into consideration the fact that we have spent upward of a billion dollars for rivers and harbors, no dollar of which has been repaid to the Government, it surely can not be said that we are asking more than is proper on behalf of these people who are doing the pioneer work of bringing arid and unfruitful acres into bearing and productiveness. The work the people on these projects are doing is not for themselves or their posterity alone, but it is a work which will, so long as time runs and these fluctuating waters flow, redound to the benefit of mankind. They have not simply made two blades of grass grow where but one grew before; they have created orchards, fertile fields, and fruitful gardens where only the cactus, the sagebrush, and the greasewood flourished. They have banished the senseless chatter of the prairie dog and the weird cry of the coyote and substituted for them the sounds of civilization, the laughter of children, and the melody of village bells. They deserve all and more than we ask in their behalf. [Applause.]

I present for the consideration of the House a number of tables, which afford information as to the state of the reclamation fund and status of reclamation projects.

Statement showing, by projects, the estimated area of public and private irrigable lands, the average size of farm unit, the approximate number of homestead and private purchases of water rights, the price per acre for which water has been sold, and the date when payments began to be made.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, to save time, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on this subject in the RECORD by adding data that I do not desire to give in full as I speak.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on this subject in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut objects.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, my only object was to save time. I shall need to ask for more time at the conclusion of the 15 minutes.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, as has been said by one or two who have preceded me, this bill is rather a compromise measure and the result of several bills that have been offered by Members from the Western States, one of those bills being offered by myself, proposing an extension of time to the homesteaders in the arid lands of the Western States. It is, as has been justly stated, one of the most important bills that this Congress has been called upon to consider, and while it directly affects but a small portion of our country, it is of immense importance to the people who are affected.

Prior to some 20 years ago all the work that had been done in the way of reclaiming the arid lands of the West, that up to that time had been indicated upon the map as the Great American Desert, had been the result of private initiative, the individual reclaiming by irrigation 160 acres of land or less; by the organization of individuals into associations and the construction of irrigation works; by the building of smaller or larger irrigation systems by private capital. In that way we succeeded in reclaiming hundreds of thousands of acres of arid lands in the West and in demonstrating that the so-called desert, if given water, would become a veritable Garden of Eden.

About 20 years ago the Carey Act was passed, which proposed that the arid States could each reclaim an amount of land not to exceed 1,000,000 acres. The work was new. The States did not understand it and did not have the machinery under which to operate, and by the time the States had passed laws and machinery had been established for the reclamation of the land another decade had practically passed by. Then it was that the sentiment in the West and the country over developed along the line that the Federal Government ought to undertake the reclaiming of the desert West. The result was the passage of the national reclamation law in 1902. Since that time both the States of the West and the Federal Government have been working—not hand in hand, but side by side—for the reclaiming of the waste areas. For my part, I think it it a good thing that these two systems have been in operation side by side. I think it has made for greater efficiency upon the part of the Government. I think it has had a wholesome effect upon the States, because the States operating independently of the Government and the Government operating independently of the States have each contributed to the success and the experience of the others, and the result is that to-day, after some 10 years' experience, both the States and the Federal Government are in better shape to go ahead with the great work of reclaiming the West than either would have been if permitted or required to undertake the work without the aid and assistance of the other. Up to this time something like $80,000,000 has been expended by the Federal Government for carrying on the reclamation work. When the law was passed we could not see very far into the future. We could not realize that land, instead of being reclaimed at an expense of some $15 to $20 or $30 an acre, would prove to be land that could not be reclaimed for less than $25 to $100 an acre. I believe $110 represents the highest amount per acre on any Federal Government project. We could not foresee those things; and when the bill was passed it was provided that the payments for the reclaiming of the land should be made by the settlers within a period of 10 years. Another provision of the law was that the lands to be reclaimed should be available for entry, after withdrawal for reclamation purposes, under the homestead law. There were those who felt there was not much demand for reclaimed or irrigated land. There were others who felt that there was great demand; and in order to test that matter out, the Congress wrote into the law a provision that these lands might be entered under the homestead law. Personally, I believe it was a mistake, and some three or four years ago it was corrected, but in the meantime thousands of settlers went upon these lands in the hope, nay, as they felt, the promise of the Government, the invitation of the Government, to settle upon these lands, because the Government intended to reclaim them.

The settlers went from the Middle West, from the Eastern States, from the Southern States, and there is probably not a Member of this House from whose State one or more or many men with their families have not gone to some part of the great western country and settled upon the arid lands. Under the hardship of the strict letter of the homestead law requiring definite residence on the land, under the strict compliance with the rules and regulations of the department touching the administrative features of the law, tremendous hardship has been worked upon the settlers. They went from the Central, Eastern, and Southern States with a few hundred dollars in money, maybe with a few thousand dollars, and with a homestead right, and took their families with them. They made entry on the desert where the Government was planning to build a reclamation system, but after waiting years it developed in some cases that these reservations were merely tentative, and nothing has even yet been done. Even taking the best conditions possible, where the Government within a short time began the construction of an irrigation system, we find the best the settlers could expect was that they would have to wait three years or four or five or six years before they could obtain water from the canals and irrigation system constructed by the Government.

The sentence "Water was turned into the ditches of the Minidoka project" or "the Payette-Boise project" on a given date carries with it to those who have never had an opportunity of observing what reclamation means the complete culmination and triumph of the irrigation project. From the standpoint of the engineer who has undertaken to deliver the water to the main canals and main laterals such may be the case, but from the standpoint of the homesteader it merely means the beginning of his work.

Imagine, if you can, a tract of land of 40, 80, or 100 acres that is partly level, partly rolling; that in part is rocky; that for the most part is covered with a growth of sagebrush, greasewood, and other desert plants, and remember that before the water that is running by, within possibly half a mile, can be made to serve its purpose upon this land laterals must be built that will convey the water to all the lands that can be irrigated.

Further than this, the lands must be cleared of the desert growth, and the clearing of lands of sagebrush and greasewood is a problem that means much work for the homesteader. In most places the land itself must be carefully handled in order that the surface may be brought into such shape that it will receive the water in uniform measure.

Beyond this, the land must be plowed and harrowed; crops must be raised; trees must be set out; homes must be built; barns and outhouses must be erected; fences must be constructed; and, in other words, the work of the homesteader on an irrigated tract during the first year or few years of his settlement is a hard work and a work that yields practically no remuneration.

The orchard will not produce its crop of fruit for several years; the level field will produce an exceedingly small crop the first year, and when all allowances have been made for unforeseen contingencies on account of climate, on account of water, on account of the soil itself, and the handling of the irrigation system, the farmer who has gone to one of our desert farms under the reclamation system with maybe several thousand dollars, has found himself at the end of two years or three years burdened with debt and struggling under responsibilities of which he had not even dreamed when he made his homestead entry.

The fine fruit that you see marketed with the name of Idaho in the Washington markets and that was grown upon irrigated lands was not grown upon lands that were irrigated for the first time last year or the year before last, but was grown upon lands that have been irrigated for many years.

The crops that can be immediately produced the first year—and none of them will do the best at that time—must be of a character necessarily as will go to the local market. With everybody producing all that he can of crops that can go to the local market, necessarily the local market itself must be overstocked, and the result is that farmers upon the irrigated tract must patiently wait.

Now, what does this all mean? It simply means this: That when we provided in 1902 that the payments upon reclamation lands should be made in 10 annual payments, we did not realize that the first few years would be practically unproductive years. We did not realize that during the first few years the expenses to which I have referred and the additional expenses of sustenance and clothing, and many household demands which press hard upon the entryman would be especially burdensome.

In this bill we are asking, not that these farmers be relieved of the payments that they have assumed. We are asking that they be granted 20 years instead of 10 within which to make their payments. We are asking further than that that during the first five years they be exempted from making payments with the exception of the first payment that will insure the good faith of the entryman.

This may not be the time to discuss the amount that the entryman should pay as his initial payment to insure good faith. The committee have proposed fixing the amount at 5 per cent. My own judgment is that for the first five years there should be no payment, or, if any, a payment not to exceed 2 per cent to insure good faith.

Take an entry of 80 acres on a project where $50 per acre represents the cost of irrigation and the entire cost of water for the project will be $4,000; 5 per cent of $4,000 is $200, an amount that could better be expended by the farmer in placing his farm into shape that would make it productive instead of being paid as a part of the cost of reclamation. Two per cent of the amount would be $80. This amount would be an evidence of good faith, and certain it is that unless we recognize that the individual farmer has a personal interest in making a success of his homestead we may as well abandon all work of this kind.

The individual homesteader is the one who is interested more than we are interested—more, even, than the community in which he lives is interested—and my experience is that he can be depended upon to do the best that is in him to make his home not only attractive from the standpoint of the home, but to make the lands that it contains remunerative in the shortest possible time. Furthermore, it has always been the theory of the homestead law that it was a law for the poor man, that it was to help the individual establish himself in the world, and to that end and carrying out that spirit the reclamation law and the payments thereunder should be made as reasonable as may be possible.

There are a great many features in this bill that I am very anxious to refer to when we consider it under the five-minute rule. There are some features in it that I do not like and that I tried to have omitted when the measure was being considered in the committee. The main thing, however, as I see it and that I urge, is that we pass the bill within the speediest possible time, to grant the settlers upon these projects the boon of a few years, at least within which they may spend all their energies, direct all their attention, and set apart all of their capital to converting the homestead into an area of land that will be productive, and that will make it possible for the homesteader to meet his payments as soon as he may get under way.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, a mistake was made when we provided that these payments should be made in so short a time as that set forth in the original bill, but a greater mistake was made when the Congress asked that beginning with the very first year of reclamation the homesteader should be in position to meet his first payment.

Experience has demonstrated abundantly that earnest as these farmers are, resourceful and energetic as they are, they can not from the land itself extract the money with which to make the payments required under the present law.

They are a thrifty people. They are an earnest people. They are a people who want only one thing at our hands and that is an opportunity. They are an industrious people; they are in every way a people than which there are none better in all our land, and who, if they could be given the opportunity of a breathing spell until they can get things going on the farm, will demonstrate within the next few years that the national reclamation law is a success; that desert lands can be made to blossom, and that the only reasonable way of carrying on a great reclamation undertaking such as our Government has inaugurated, is by placing it upon the basis as it concerns the individual farmer as will enable him within reason to maintain his home, to make improvements, and to bring the desert land itself into a state of fruitful production. So much for even the most favorable conditions. The lot of the homesteaders who have been compelled to live on arid lands years before water was made available—and most of the homesteaders have had that experience—is doubly hard.

The settlers were required to live on the lands in order not to forfeit their homestead rights, and required to do a certain amount of cultivation and improvement. It was a desert country and they could not raise crops successfully by dry farming, and as a result they were compelled to expend the substance they brought there with them in order that they might build up and develop their land.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman explain how long it takes to cultivate crops and have trees come to fruit in a country like that. How long does a settler have to wait?

Mr. FRENCH. I will be glad to answer the gentleman. The point I have been making is that prior to the turning on of the water on the land several years must elapse before the settler can make progress or set out an orchard, for instance, because probably there is no crop that requires water immediately upon its being set out as does a fruit orchard of any character.

Mr. MOORE. He first has to clear away the sagebrush.

Mr. FRENCH. Yes; he first clears away the sagebrush, and it takes several years to clear away the sagebrush and completely subdue a farm of that character and prepare it for the water to be placed on it.

Mr. MOORE. In the meanwhile he has to live and has no fresh vegetables?

Mr. FRENCH. He has to live, and he has little opportunity to raise vegetables from the soil; often he has to buy them.

Mr. MOORE. And his holdings produce nothing.

Mr. FRENCH. In many instances they produce practically nothing. In some instances, under stress of circumstances, settlers have made the desert land itself, through intense cultivation and great care, yield something upon which they could live.

Mr. MOORE. After he gets the brush and cacti removed and has a chance to plant something, how long would it take apple trees or fruit trees to grow and produce a crop?

Mr. FRENCH. Within three, four, or five years a little fruit is raised, but often seven years or longer before a dependable crop can be raised.

Mr. MOORE. And he must maintain himself for four or five years before he gets anything?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes; even after the land is reclaimed.

Mr. MOORE. The cost of construction, if I understood the gentleman from Wyoming correctly, amounts to from $25 to $65 an acre?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes; and often runs up to $100.

Mr. MOORE. And up to that time he gets no return?

Mr. FRENCH. Practically nothing.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Are not a great many of these landholders speculators, and not farmers at all?

Mr. FRENCH. I am glad to answer that question. The law requires one to be a bona fide homesteader when he enters the land. These lands were taken up by those willing to maintain them in good faith, and there are not many people on reclamation projects that are there for the purpose of speculation, other than that praiseworthy speculation which prompts any man to make a trade or to buy property for a home or to take a homestead in the rainfall belt. Most of the people are people of very small means indeed.

Mr. PLATT. Is it not a fact that a large proportion of these people who took up lands have sold out instead of cultivating it after they got the title?

Mr. FRENCH. The gentleman has asked another question that I am glad he asked. Prior to the repeal of the provision of the law permitting the settlers to enter after the withdrawals had been made, many settlers went upon the projects, and although they were opposed by the forces of nature, they tried to live there until the land could be reclaimed. They were forced by dire necessity to spend two or three years of their lives there, to spend all the substance they had accumulated, and finally some of them threw up their lands and moved off and let somebody else take the burden, being fortunate if they could obtain a little compensation for their relinquishment. There were some who did that, but they were not speculators; they were forced to sell. They would not have been there if it had not been for the practical invitation of the Government to go upon the land several years before the water was available for reclamation.

I want to say that there is probably no system so well calculated to break up large holdings of land as the irrigation system we are developing in our western country. People desire to live upon small units of land—and this is in response to the question or suggestion from the gentleman from New York—and in all the projects the tendency is more and more to break up the 160 and 160 acre tracts into 80 acres, 30 acres, 20 acres, and so on.

I was talking to a gentleman not long ago who told me that already in the State of Utah the average farmer upon irrigated lands owns not far from 30 acres. In my State the projects are newer, and probably the average is a little larger than that, but it certainly can not be greatly larger, and the tendency on all those projects is for the lands to be broken up into smaller and smaller amounts, until the lands can be made to serve the greatest number of people who live upon the lands.

Mr. Chairman, I stated what I did a moment ago—before I was interrupted—to call attention to the great necessity for relief at this time. Thousands of people before water was available for reclamation had expended all of their substance waiting for the water to be turned upon their lands. We repealed the clause permitting advance entries, but that did not help the poor settlers who had already gone there and had established homes.

Let us assume a more favorable condition. Let us assume the people enter upon the lands at the time that the water is made available by the Government. Then what do we have? As has been suggested by the questions that have been asked, it is necessary to wait two, three, or four years for the lands to be brought into shape that they may be productive to such an extent that they can materially reduce the cost of the irrigation system to the settler. The settler who has gone broke, who has absorbed all of his substance by the time that the water is available, is in a bad way. You can readily understand the straits that he is in. I then call attention to the fact that the man who goes upon the land the first year that water is available is also in severe straits, because his orchard that he may set out will not be bearing for the market short of four to seven years, the lands that he might cultivate for annual crops will not be capable of the greatest production for two or three years, and then, again, settlers make mistakes in not knowing what crops will find ready market.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. COLLIER. I would like to know this: What new legislation does this bill seek to enact aside from the 10-year extension without the payment of interest and the administrative features associated with that?

Mr. FRENCH. I will say to the gentleman that that is the heart of the bill. The other features as we get to them can probably be developed best under the five-minute rule; but that is the heart of the bill. It is to extend the number of payments from 10 to 20 years, to provide a small initial payment, and to waive payment for a period of 5 years after that, permitting the settler to get on his feet.

Mr. MOORE. In substance it is a relief bill?

Mr. FRENCH. It is a relief bill, pure and simple, but one that contemplates payment of money originally assumed by the settler to the Government during a period of 20 years.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says that it is a relief bill, pure and simple. Does not the bill provide that people who go upon these irrigated lands hereafter shall be required to pay only 5 per cent of the construction charge when they make their entry, and even not then until they get their water, and that thereafter they shall be required to make no payment for 5 years, and never be required to pay anything for interest?

Mr. FRENCH. Oh, that is true.

Mr. MANN. And that applies to people hereafter?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. MANN. That is not a relief bill, is it?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SELDOMRIDGE). The time of the gentleman from Idaho has expired.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Nebraska to yield me some more time.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my objections to the gentleman's request, putting what he sees best in the RECORD. He has talked upon this subject intelligently, and he has stuck to the text of the bill; and that is a great treat after the quibbling that we are obliged to listen to most of the time.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes more to the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Connecticut has been so good-natured and complimentary in his remarks that I may avail myself of the privilege of inserting certain data that will be of interest. There may be some things that I would like also to put into the RECORD on account of interruptions. I yield now further to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, what I wanted to know was, if there is anything else to be accomplished by this bill other than the extension of that time?

Mr. FRENCH. Oh, that is the heart of it; and while there are other things embodied in the bill, some things that I favor and some that I do not, that is the heart of it, and it is because of that part of the bill that I am so anxious that the bill shall be enacted into law.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. The gentleman is especially strong for that part of the bill that provides for loaning money to purchasers without interest. I wish the gentleman would answer the inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], which he made a moment ago upon that subject, and at the same time explain why we ought to loan farmers out in Idaho money without interest when they are refusing to loan the farmers down in Ohio money for which they offer to pay interest?

Mr. FRENCH. To whom is that last criticism directed?

Mr. GORDON. It is directed against this bill; against the very bowels of it.

Mr. FRENCH. That last criticism against not permitting the farmers to borrow money in Ohio? I favored the farm-credit bill some time ago.

Mr. GORDON. Oh, I am opposed to loaning farmers money out of the Federal Treasury, even if they pay interest upon it. But I can not see why you should loan these irrigators out West money without interest, and that is what I would like to have the gentleman elaborate.

Mr. FRENCH. I am glad the gentleman has asked that question, and I was going to answer the question as originally asked by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. In the first place, we ought to pass this bill providing the relief and extension of time for 20 years without interest for the reason that the original bill did not contemplate that interest should be paid, and all the contracts which were entered into were entered into on the distinct understanding upon the part of the settlers that interest should not be paid. I see the point the gentleman has in mind when he says, how about it then as applied to all future entrymen? Now, as applied to all future entrymen as well as those upon the lands now, I would say that this bill ought to pass making that provision for the reason that it affords the best way of developing the western country, in which the whole Nation has a vital interest. It is the same principle we have applied in developing the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers [applause], the same principle as in developing harbors along the Great Lakes, as in developing the great ports along the Atlantic seaboard, as in developing the tributaries of our larger rivers into a network of waterways for the great benefit of the American people. Congress is making appropriations of millions upon millions of dollars for this work, and is not only providing that interest shall not be paid, but with the distinct understanding that the principal itself shall never be paid. [Applause.]

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. I do.

Mr. GORDON. Permit me to ask right there, what is the analogy between spending money on public highways open to everybody and the spending of money upon private property?

Mr. FRENCH. It seems to me that the gentleman ought to see a very clear analogy between the spending of millions of dollars for the improvement of waterways along our coasts, for the improvement of the Mississippi River and its tributaries, for improvement of all the ports for the use of the trade of this country, for the primary benefit of those immediately concerned in trade or those living near by who are benefited by the improvements and the values they create.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman weakens his case, as I think the gentleman from Wyoming did, when he makes the comparison between irrigated lands and waterways. The gentleman ought to see the distinction between the improvement of a waterway which is a public project, not for the benefit of any individual, and the appropriations of money, directly or indirectly, as in the case of irrigation, for the ultimate benefit of the individual if not for the present benefit of the individual. Now, I have heard it said that this bill, which I would like to favor as a relief measure, because I think these farmers sorely need the assistance—I have heard it said this bill was to be used to a certain extent as a buffer against the river and harbor bill, which is being held up on the other side of the Capitol. I would very much regret being forced to vote for or against this bill, feeling that it was obstructing a bill intended to appropriate money for the rivers and harbors of this country.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If the gentleman will permit me at that point, I think the only one I have ever heard make a suggestion of that kind was the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. FRENCH. I will say I never heard even of that suggestion in reference to this bill. However, since the gentleman has referred to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], I believe he did suggest that with the same propriety that this Congress should appropriate for rivers and harbors that it ought to pass, not this bill but a bill to create a bond issue which would afford a further extension of the reclamation law.

Mr. MOORE. I raise the question now because two speakers, both of them conspicuous advocates of irrigation projects, have suggested that those projects are worthy as against rivers and harbors projects.

Mr. PAYNE. Do I understand the gentleman is advocating now a bond issue for the reclamation project?

Mr. FRENCH. No; not at all; I am advocating the passage of this bill. I was answering the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the suggestion made by the gentleman from Colorado; and the suggestion was made—I have seen it reported in the papers—that the same argument that has been used in favor of passing a liberal appropriation for rivers and harbors ought to hold good in providing some appropriation or a bond issue for carrying on the reclamation work.

Mr. PAYNE. Is the gentleman in favor of the proposition that the expense of improving the rivers and harbors should be assessed upon the people of the United States according to the benefits they receive?

Mr. FRENCH. They have never been assessed that way.

Mr. PAYNE. I know; but would the gentleman favor it? Of course the gentleman knows that would be very hard on the people of his State to receive as much benefit in proportion to what they have invested in the State as any State in the Union; but why does the gentleman bring in any such argument as that? Is he willing to have an assessment made upon all the people of all the States according to the benefits they receive from river and harbor improvements? Why not discuss this question by itself on its merits?

Mr. FRENCH. The assessments for river and harbor improvements will, of course, fall upon the country generally, the people of my State as well as the people from the State of New York, and we are glad to bear our part.

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, the difficulty is the people of the State of New York have to pay one-third to one-half of all the assessments of all the States.

Now, if you are willing to have the people of your State assessed according to the benefit, we will take it in New York State, and gladly take it, and pay in that proportion. But I do not think you ought to bring it into an argument for this bill.

Now, when we had this matter up three or four years ago and you were trying to get the loan, which I favored at that time and helped to get through, the statement was made that the people who had gone out there generally in response, not to the invitation of the Government, but to the invitation of the railroad agents and land agents and all that sort of thing, and having hard luck, had found employment, a great many of them, with contractors who were actually building these works, and that that had helped tide them over.

Mr. FRENCH. That has helped out some.

Mr. PAYNE. A good deal, has it not?

Mr. FRENCH. A good deal; yes.

Mr. PAYNE. In telling these hard-luck stories, why do you not tell the whole thing and lay the proposition before the Members of the House, so that they can understand it from the beginning to the end? Of course when you started in with this thing we were promised if we would turn over to the irrigation fund the avails from the sale of land and from the sale of additional land and pay for those first works, it would so increase the irrigation fund the Treasury would never have to pay a dollar. And when we loaned the $20,000,000 the promise was made that we would get this money back. I am in favor of relieving those people out there and extending the time for payment, but it ought to be put on an equitable basis all the way through. And if we made a mistake in not charging interest on the money the Government actually pays out, we ought to provide for that now, and other things, as we go along, and deal fairly with the people who are interested. And while we in the State of New York think we have to pay a good deal more than other sections of the country, we are patriotically willing to stand our full share, and we will not weigh it on apothecary scales either. But sometimes you bear pretty heavily on New York and other eastern States in all of these projects.

And there is another thing I want to ask you about right there. There is a proposition in the sundry civil bill for a survey of the underground streams in some of the States for the purpose of irrigation. Is it proposed to saddle that upon the people of the country, too?

Mr. BRYAN. Let me suggest to the gentleman that the last expenditure I noticed on that line was for measuring the stream flow of the Hudson River.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, the Hudson River benefits every section of the country, but the improvement has generally been paid for by the State of New York. We have also built the canal there and given you the benefit of it, too. So do not throw that at me.

Mr. BRYAN. You can get more benefit from the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Attorney General than from any other department.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me in line with the statements I have already made that the analogy is complete, and that the aid that the Federal Government is giving in the development of our waterways and our harbors and other improvements of that character that are shared by the people generally, without the hope of having any interest paid, and without the hope of having the principal paid, ought to be carried further and be maintained as it was maintained when the original law was passed, and let this money, the most of which will ultimately come from the public lands themselves, largely, in fact, on account of the irrigation and reclamation work that we have been carrying on, constitute a fund to be used for the reclamation of our great western country in the carrying on of a work that will be of benefit to the people of my State, it is true, and so, the country; and, indeed, the people of my State are people transplanted from every other State in the American Union. This is a bill that is of interest to all, just as the river and harbor bill is a bill that is of interest to all.

Again, the settlers upon reclamation projects should not be required to pay interest, because this reclamation work is a part of the great homestead policy that the Government has followed for half a century.

The fertile lands of Illinois, of Iowa, of Minnesota required not that they be irrigated when they were given to the people of these States. Yet it is proposed, as regards lands, that without irrigation are desert, the Government shall make them fit for homes providing the settlers then establish their residence and even pay the initial cost to the Government of reclamation work and, indeed, we are requiring more of these settlers than was required of the settlers of the great States of the Plains.

Again, the extension of time should be granted without interest, because public policy in many other lines has made it seem best for the Government to bear largely of the initial burden, bearing the burden collectively, that the great good might come later on because of the completion of the object sustained through Government aid.

Less than one week ago I voted to pass the bill that carried $200,000 for the relief of the sufferers in Salem, Mass., on account of the disaster there. My people are willing to bear their share of this burden.

We have made Federal appropriations for the maintenance of levees to prevent the overflow of the Mississippi River. We have donated millions of acres of the public domain to the building of railroads throughout the country. We have done these things because it was felt that the large public policy of building up our country in these lines could be better assumed by the Government than by the individuals if required to bear the burden or to work out these projects without aid.

Just one other word and then my time will be up, and that is this: These settlers may be able to go ahead if you provide an interest payment in passing this bill. But, gentlemen, it is not right that you require it from them. It is not right, manifestly, that you require it from the settlers who have already gone upon the lands upon the basis of the original law which required no interest payment. It is as much of a violation of our duty to those settlers to require interest to be paid as it would be to impose some other condition that is utterly impossible upon an individual, and then under the stress and coercion of that impossible condition make him agree, voluntarily, then, if you please, and couch his agreement in that language, to submit to the impossible conditions. If I held you up at the point of a gun and asked that you make me a present of your purse and your watch and your chain, and you couched your presentation speech in most beautiful and gracious language to me, I have done a wrong because I have obtained under coercion that which is yours. And the same principle applies here. Many of these settlers are in desperate straits, many of them would be glad to grab at a straw, to grab at anything, to avail themselves of any opportunity, to get relief, and even to agree to pay interest, if necessary, in order to tide them over, but, gentlemen of this House, it is not right that we should require that of them any more than it is right that under the stress of impossible conditions you compel a citizen to agree to conditions that originally he did not want to assume.

I thank the gentlemen. [Applause.]

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I was a Member of the House when the reclamation bill first passed. There was a great deal of opposition to the subject for a good many years. I was one of those who supported the proposition for the Reclamation Service. I think at that time we made a mistake, which I am afraid we may repeat now, of letting those people who are strongly in favor of the irrigation service draw the bill instead of having it drawn by those who were in favor and those who were not so strongly in favor. We undoubtedly made a great mistake when we provided that the money paid into the Treasury from the sale of public lands should be paid out in irrigation work without any control of it by Congress.

The result of that was natural and, I think, inevitable. Everybody became interested in irrigation work. The States, through the Carey Act and through private contractors, and the Government, by the incentive which was given to the movement by a law of Congress, and everybody started in with irrigation projects. Most of them to-day have been unsuccessful, both the Government projects and the private projects, and there are now floating all over the country great quantities of bonds on irrigation projects which are not worth 100 cents on the dollar, and many of which never will be paid.

We started it with a whoop and a hurrah. We have now expended in the neighborhood of $75,000,000 or more, coming in from the sales of the public domain, in carrying on a great number of reclamation projects. People all over the country were taught to believe that anybody, without knowledge on the subject, could just go out West and take up from 5 to 160 acres of land connected with an irrigation project and be living in easy affluence ever after; and men who did not know a barn from an office building went out on these projects and took up land.

It was inevitable that most of them should fail. There were many eastern farmers—and I use the term "eastern" merely as the western people use it—who went out there who knew something about farming where the Lord provides the water at regular periods, but who knew nothing about farming on an irrigation project, and they did not succeed very well. And then the Government engineers started in to construct these projects, thinking they knew in advance what it would cost, and people crowded upon the projects, and it developed that the cost was much greater than it was anticipated. Where men might have been able to pay the original estimated cost, they were not able to pay the cost which finally developed, and in many cases, owing to the lack of money coming in in such quantity as some gentlemen with iridescent dreams in their heads imagined, the Government was not able to finish the projects and furnish the water within the time that had been anticipated and which had been promised. There were thousands of people upon these lands that were worth nothing without water, and no water; and, of course, they could not succeed, and could not pay their share of the construction charges.

I do not agree with the gentlemen from the Western States that the irrigation service is at all comparable with the construction of rivers and harbors. They are on different lines entirely. It may better be compared to the homestead law, where we give to the man who takes up, for $1.25 an acre or for nothing, land worth from $25 to $100 an acre if it were put up for sale. It may be compared with that system of parting with our public domain. But a river and harbor scheme would never be defensible; no expenditure for river and harbor improvement is defensible, except upon the theory that it is worth what it costs and must pay to somebody—the public as a whole—more than the interest on the investment. When we improve a harbor, if that were just a dead loss, no one could defend it. We assume that when we have improved the harbor there will be such a reduction in the cost of transportation, applicable to all parts of the country, as will more than pay 3 or 4 or 5 per cent interest on the money we have expended.

Now, we come to the question of these settlers out in the West. Undoubtedly some relief must be granted to them. The Government does not desire to dispossess them from the land upon which they have entered. We want to help them to the point where they can cultivate the soil and make it profitable. But, after all, when any investment is made by the Government we must ask the question, Does it pay to make the investment? No one would think of having the Government construct great public works unless we thought it paid, unless we thought that the returns to the public at large would be more than a reasonable rate of interest.

Now, the bill that we have before us not only covers the irrigation projects now in existence, but it also covers all possible irrigation projects in the future. And what is the very first provision in this bill? That is the one as to the irrigation projects hereafter. The Government is to go ahead and spend the money constructing irrigation projects. Then it is to give the land outright to the persons who enter it. That is conformable to our homestead law. The person then pays 5 per cent of the construction charge of the project, the cost of the construction being supposedly charged against the property which receives the benefit of the irrigation. They pay 5 per cent. Then they pay nothing for five years, is it not?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Four years.

Mr. MADDEN. Five years.

Mr. GORDON. Yes; five years. You have it right.

Mr. MANN. They pay nothing for five years, not even interest. Now, if the investment of this money on these projects does not produce at least 3 per cent interest, what is the reason why we invest it?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 15 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Make it 10 minutes. I shall not use more than that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN. We would not make an investment anywhere unless we thought there would be some return from it. While it is true in a way that there is a return to the public at large from having anybody cultivate any portion of the soil and produce crops, because we could not live without the cultivation of the soil and without the production of crops, yet no sensible man individually would think for a moment of investing money in a farm which would not pay any interest whatever or any return whatever. And the question is whether the Government is under obligation to furnish the cost of constructing irrigation works and then give the land away, and in addition give the use of the money for 20 years without any interest whatever, because under this bill, after the man pays 5 per cent of the principal, he pays nothing more of the principal for five years. Then he pays 5 per cent of the principal a year for five years. After that he pays 7 per cent, I believe it is, so that the principal is entirely repaid in 20 years' time.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. The gentleman has expressed a desire to give relief to a very deserving class of citizens. Does not the gentleman recognize the fact that if interest charges are imposed on these people in making these payments the time of payment would necessarily have to be extended in which to meet the principal?

Mr. MANN. I have not yet discussed the question that the gentleman is talking about.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Is there not a consideration in the shortness of time for the payment of the principal?

Mr. MANN. I have not discussed that feature as applicable to the present irrigation projects. I was discussing the first section of the bill, which the gentleman from Colorado knows does not apply to anybody now on the irrigation projects, but applies only to those who go upon these projects in the future.

The question is, whether the Government is under obligation now to loan money—because that is what it amounts to—to a farmer out West for the purpose of permitting him to cultivate the soil without interest, without any payment for five years, except 5 per cent of the principal of the loan, and at the same time decline to loan money to the farmers east of the Rocky Mountains, who are willing to pay interest for the construction of barns, for the purchase of stock, for the purchase of farm implements, and possibly also for the purchase of land, all of which they greatly need.

There are thousands of people in my city who would be extremely glad to have the Government say to them, "If you will pay back to us 5 per cent on $10,000, we will advance you the $10,000 to go down into Illinois and buy a farm, and then you do not need to pay any more for five years. You need never pay the interest, but if you will pay back the principal in the course of 20 years you may have the farm." These people would be willing to do more than that. They would be willing to pay 3 per cent interest on the $10,000. They would be glad of the opportunity.

Mr. MONDELL. Of course the gentleman realizes that during these four and a half or five years during which the entryman is not to pay any building charge he is all that time paying a maintenance charge of from one to two dollars an acre.

Mr. MANN. Oh, certainly; he is paying the maintenance charge, but he is paying for water, which he gets when he wants it. In many portions of the country he pays for the water, but the Lord does not always give it to him when he wants it, and sometimes he loses his whole crop thereby.

But I do not complain about anything. I thought it was proper to call the attention of the Members of the House to the propositions involved in the bill, because I was very sure that the gentlemen advocating the bill would never do so. I do not complain of the length of time given to these people, or of the fact that it is proposed to require no payment for five years. The Government would still hold the title to the property. But the proposition to which I am seeking to call the attention of the House is whether we can loan money without any interest to one set of people in the country and then refuse to loan money to other people, equally meritorious, who are willing to pay interest.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Has the gentleman taken into consideration the fact that on these new projects that are contemplated the cost of the water will probably be $100 an acre, and if you add to that the interest, it would make it impossible to sell the land?

Mr. MANN. Then what is the reason we do it?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Simply because if interest is imposed it would be impossible——

Mr. MANN. There is no reason that can be given, except the fact that gentlemen want it. If the project, when carried into execution, will not pay interest, it ought not to be entered upon. The gentleman might as well propose that if the farmer can not make a living upon these irrigation projects, we ought to pay him an annuity every year in order that he may buy his groceries and meat. What is the distinction?

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], in his address on this subject, indicated that about 10,000 farmers would be affected. According to the ordinary method of calculation that would mean 50,000 people, all told—farmers and their families. Is that the extent of the benefit we would be granting by passing this bill?

Mr. MANN. That is not. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] gave the wrong impression, if that is what he stated. I did not hear him make the statement.

Mr. MOORE. I mean to ask whether 10,000 farmers will be affected, and whether those figures are correct?

Mr. MANN. They only apply to 10,000 farmers now on irrigation projects; but the bill contemplates the continuous use for all time of all money coming to the Government from the public domain, in building irrigation projects, and applies to everybody who goes on those projects in the future. There may be 10,000 of them now. I do not know how many of them there will be.

Mr. MOORE. And for those 10,000 farmers we have already expended under the reclamation system about $80,000,000.

Mr. MANN. I do not know how many farmers there are. Somewhere in the neighborhood of $80,000,000 have been expended, I believe.

Now, I have said so much in regard to the future. I leave it to the House to determine how gentlemen will go home to districts which are not in the arid region and explain to their farmer constituents why they voted to give the farmers in Colorado money to the extent of $50 to $100 an acre for 20 years without interest, and voted against or refused to consider a proposition to have the Government loan the farmers in their districts money upon which those farmers were willing to pay 3 to 5 per cent interest. I do not have to meet that question, as far as the farmers are concerned, though I do not know what my constituents who want to build homes will say. Some man might say "I would like to have a little home, and I want to buy a lot. It is just as important for me to have a home as for some man in Montana or Wyoming, and now you are taxing me indirectly to give him money without interest. For God's sake let me have some, and I will pay interest."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. ROBERTS of Nevada. Is there not a material difference between the farmer who lives in a country where they have rain occasionally and the farmer who lives in a country where they do not have any rain?

Mr. MANN. There is a material difference in his surroundings, but no difference in the farmer himself. All of those people have come from the country where they have rain. They are the same kind of people, all trying to make a living properly. They have my entire sympathy in that respect.

Mr. ROBERTS of Nevada. Is it not a fact that the one farmer needs it and the other does not need it, and the country is getting the benefit of the crops where God Almighty sends the water, and the country is also getting the benefit of the irrigation projects where the water is corralled and brought to them?

Mr. MANN. Oh, the man in the East needs the money, or thinks he does, just as much as the man in the West. The only difference is that the people in the East are a little more modest about the way they ask for it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly; I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SHERLEY. I want to suggest to the gentleman that there is a great deal of land on which rain falls that is not being cultivated, and there are a great many men who would be glad to buy it at the Government expense. Would it not be better to help them to buy land in a country where the Lord helps them than to send them out West, where it is necessary to go to the expense of irrigating?

Mr. MANN. There is probably more land within 100 or 200 miles of the Capital of the greatest Nation of the world, which people would be glad to take and cultivate if the Government would loan them the money at interest to buy it, than there is in all of the irrigation projects that the Government has anything to do with.

Now, as to those who are already on the irrigation projects, they have agreed to pay back the construction charges within a certain time, within 10 years. Here is the proposition: Let them pay back 2 per cent a year for 4 years instead of 10 per cent a year, with the hope, as provided in the bill, that they will pay it all back within 20 years' time. Now, that is without interest. If these people upon these projects can not make out of the use of the soil more than 2 per cent a year on the construction charges, I think we had better abandon the whole Reclamation Service. There are thousands of ways by which we can invest money and increase the production of the soil that will pay more than 2 per cent a year. There is not 10 per cent of the farms of the country where they can not by the use of more money increase their product more than 2 per cent on the cost of the increase.

Now, I am perfectly willing to give these people 10 years' time, 20 years' time, 40 years' time, 50 years' time, so far as that is concerned, for the payment back of the money which the Government has invested there. I do not believe that it is profitable to the Government to engage in enterprises of that kind unless the return warrants some payment of interest. True, the law now, drawn by the friends of irrigation—and I do not blame them for getting all they can—does not provide for the payment of interest. Although they drew the law and put everything in they could in their favor, they are now stung. [Laughter.] That is true, and we all admit it.

If these projects will not pay any interest on the investment, why should we make them? These people are asking for delay in payment. I think we ought to give them the delay in payment; but if the projects are worthy at all, they ought in the end to pay interest on the investment. Why should we let even our friends out there have vast sums of money, millions upon millions, which are unprofitable, where the investment is not worth while, investments that no one would make? We either ought to back out or else they ought to be able in some way to pay something for the use of that money. They want the time extended 10 years, and I would be willing to make it a great deal longer than that, but the Government ought under no circumstances to advance to any project any money unless the project is worth the while. The test whether an expenditure ought to be made and whether the project is worth the while is, Is it profitable in some direction? You can not very well differentiate the farmer in one part of the country from the farmer in another part of the country or the crops in one part of the country from the crops in another part of the country. The test is whether he can afford to pay for the use of the money. [Applause.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. FERGUSSON].

Mr. FERGUSSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it must be obvious to all that I labor under a disadvantage, not by design, but by accident, in following the gentleman from Illinois. Still I have some ideas that I would like to present briefly, based largely on a life of about 30 years in the midst of the scenes of these irrigation projects.

Now, as to the return of interest. We spend millions of dollars for great public interests, for great public improvements, affecting all the people, like the rivers and harbors, pensions, and various matters for the general good of the public in this country, and nobody before ever thought of charging interest to be paid by the people who receive benefit therefrom.

I look at this question—the effort to reclaim the great arid lands of the West—as a great public question. Our industrial centers, our cities, are filled with people without a place to lay their heads, without a spot they can call a home. Many of them are burdened or blessed with wife and children. They are anxious to get into the West, where there is a chance to build a home for themselves and children. Why discriminate, why make ingenious arguments, almost Shylock-like, looking at it from a business point, when everybody knows that the effort is to provide homes by law in the great arid West, where alone in our country it is possible for a poor man without a home, with wife and children around him, to make a home for himself and his family.

Now, gentlemen talk about interest. Under this law a man goes out on the land. He expects the Government to furnish him water. He is excused for five years from paying anything, but what does he do? In the general interest of the great public of the United States, in the general interest of the people of the great arid West, he seeks to increase the population and the number of home lovers and those who make patriotic citizens. It is a fact that those who own their homes here are the very best citizens of our country. What does he do in lieu of paying interest? because I think that is the only argument against this bill that has any force in it. What does this man do during the five years? He has to level the land, grub up the roots of the cacti and the mesquite, the roots of which are as big as your leg and run far into the ground, and which they dig up and dry and use for fuel. He has to dig and level and reclaim the land. Do you want to charge him interest for doing a great public service like that, in addition to all the labor that he has to do to prepare the land for irrigation? Not only does he have to dig up the roots and clear the land from rocks and other obstructions, but he also has to level it, which takes teams and plows and scrapers and labor, a devotion that you who have never lived in the West can not conceive of. He has to do all that in addition to his other duties.

Now, these great appropriations for rivers and harbors are sufficiently paid for by the general good that is done. We are entitled to that argument as much as anyone else. We in the West know the suffering of these poor homeseekers, and when they devote their lives to reclaiming the West, in God's name are they not paying interest? In addition to that, under this general scheme they agree to pay the principal back. Who is going to pay the principal back on all of your money that you appropriate for pensions and for rivers and harbors, which you pile, in addition to labor and cruel privations, upon these poor devils, many of whom I have seen upon the verge of starvation. I have seen a man who tried to make a home under a 160 or a 320 acre homestead and who has failed, and met by absolute suffering for himself and family. You ask why did he go there.

Mr. Chairman, how can he live in the cities when sometimes he can not get work? He wants to go somewhere, and now for 20 years, and latterly still more than earlier, you have driven him to Canada, where the British Government, with a liberality which we might well copy, has made the land laws so that our people, being unable to get homes in the United States, are going to Canada. I will tell you, you need to help these men. Instead of making them pay interest, it would be no more than just that you would excuse them from paying part of the principal back, because of the great natural obstructions which must be overcome by this bold pioneer, who fears no hardship, who fears no deprivation of the ordinary necessities of life, who, driven by dire necessity, by his crying babies and his poor, ill-clad wife, must submit to any hardship that you put upon him. I have seen not one, but a dozen, who have failed utterly for two successive years. No rain. This year in New Mexico it has rained as much as it has in Washington, and those who had the nerve to put in crops again will profit by it; but last year it did not rain at all and the seed did not sprout, and I have seen these men breaking rocks on the streets in my city, with their wives out in the country 20 or 30 miles, in their little shacks, absolutely on the verge of starvation. And now you want to make him pay interest. Is it not a great public question? I have lived for 30 years in these scenes, and I know what I am talking about. Is it not a great public question to so fix these reclamation laws, the one that you are now considering, as that these men can reclaim the land? They can not reclaim the land if you put the screws to them, Shylock-like—every dollar back or you get no chance. If it were a private benefaction to each man, that would be a different question.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERGUSSON. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Right upon that point—if it were a private benefaction. Why is not this just as much a private question as it would be if the people in my city who have no homes should come here and press the argument that the American people are interested in having every citizen in the country own his own home?

Mr. FERGUSSON. I would say that you are right, and I will do anything within the power of this great Government, with its limitless wealth, filling up so rapidly now with the increase in its own population and the influx of helpless and hopeless people from other lands. I would say, "Yes: if you are an honest man, if you have a wife and children, if you need a little help, and if you will pay the principal back, I will excuse you from paying interest for 20 or 40 years." I would help that man.

Mr. GORDON. Does the gentleman know what that would bring this Government to? Where would we get the money to do that?

Mr. FERGUSSON. The gentleman does not think we have no money?

Mr. GORDON. We have not any money to engage in such enterprises as that.

Mr. FERGUSSON. How about the $150,000,000 for pensions that we have been expending for the last 40 years? You do not ask the principal or the interest back upon that.

Mr. MADDEN. No; they get that.

Mr. FERGUSSON. But when we from the West come here in good faith, with our hearts beating with sympathy for the efforts of men to make homes, and make a proposition to give to these people the use of the money which will be amply secured, every dollar, because the acre now is not worth two cents; and when the man gets through with it, with the help of the Government in loaning him the money, if you want to put it that way, or with the help of the Government in reclaiming hundreds of thousands of acres by irrigation enterprises—when we come and make that proposition to you, you say, "No; you must pay the interest."

The man says to the Government, "Let me have 40 acres or 60 acres or 80 acres; let me have a chance, and I will make that land so that it will be worth ten times the value of it now, when you gave me the money to use upon it." Is not that something better than interest—the good he does the General Government and the country we live in? My friend, I am thoroughly convinced that if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] understood the matter he would look at it differently. This gentleman, the minority leader, with his powerful and ingenious mind, has looked at this only from the Shylock business standpoint, when it is a great public question that ought to challenge the patriotism and the heart, if he has any, of every man upon this floor, to help these people in these cities that can not get work, at least to the extent of excusing them from the payment of interest, when the acre of land when he goes upon it is not worth a dollar. In the course of 20 years he will make that acre worth to the whole Government $20, and he will pay you the principal back besides.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERGUSSON. Yes.

Mr. COX. What does the gentleman say in response to the argument made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that on principles of equity and equality, if the Government embarks in this line of work of giving to the gentleman's people all of the money needed to develop irrigation, without interest, the Government should also give to the people in the State of Illinois and the people in the State of Indiana, where we can buy good land and get anywhere from $50 to $100 an acre, an amount of money sufficient to buy from 80 to 160 acres free of interest? What does the gentleman say in response to that argument, which strikes me to be the very gist of the gentleman's argument?

Mr. FERGUSSON. Mr. Chairman, my answer to that is this, that in Illinois, or in the gentleman's own State of Indiana, the land, as the illustration indicates, is already worth $50 to $100 an acre. If the Government furnished the money to go and buy some of that, the man would have to be tolerably well fixed to start with. We would create a market for that land that would make it worth $250 an acre for speculative purposes pretty soon, but the gentleman's question ignores utterly the point that I have been trying to enforce in my inexperienced way here. I have spoken many times in the courts of our country, but seldom in a parliamentary body. Gentlemen, you ignore the fact that the Government of the United States has engaged in great enterprises intended for the general good of the Government. I will say another thing, that your proposition would involve leaving forever unreclaimed these great valuable rich public lands, and I can not overstate the richness of the soil with water on it. It is absolutely astonishing how rich it is with plenty of water on it. You are ignoring utterly this great proposition, the national importance of it. You should put out of your mind the question of dollars and cents. I am willing to vote for any bill here that will help a man with his wife and baby, in the congested cities, or in the big industrial centers, to get a start some way. Ah, my friends, if we do not realize the kind of civilization we are in, as it has evolved up to date; if we do not realize that we must go forward and forward and get the Shylock system back of us, instead of having a great President, a constitutional President, conceiving the principles of government as Jefferson founded it, as Lincoln interpreted it; a Government of the great masses of common people, to be owned by them, to be run by them, for their benefit; if we do not rise up to the occasion, you are going to drive us back to a great oligarchy and despotism, or you are going to have in the presidential chair some Debs and a great cataclysm may come on this country; not as in France, but it will come to this country under the reign of the ballot. In France, the poor devils had nothing but the bullet and guillotine to correct their wrongs, but with universal suffrage in this country you should not stretch the Shylock argument of reactionaryism too far in this day and generation. [Applause.]

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 or 20 minutes, as he may desire, to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I confess, to begin with, I am not very familiar with farming in irrigated territory, but I understand that these projects cover about 3,000,000 acres; that is, that 3,000,000 acres will be the sum total of the land that can be reclaimed under these projects. We were given to understand when we entered upon the development of these arid lands by these irrigation projects that the cost per acre would be about $22.50. We have already expended about $80,000,000 and I believe $20,000,000 has been made available, so that if we were to assume that the money already expended and that which is available would cover the cost of the reclamation projects, totaling 3,000,000 acres of land, we would have expended at the rate of $33 per acre. But I am told that it is estimated to cost about $50,000,000 before these projects can be completed, and I would not wonder if it would cost $50,000,000 more than the estimated $50,000,000 before they will be completed; and if that should be true, we would find ourselves having expended $200,000,000 for the development of 3,000,000 acres of land——

Mr. COX. Pretty expensive land.

Mr. MADDEN (continuing). Or sixty-six and a third dollars per acre. Now, I can see that it would be hard for those who settle upon these lands to meet the payments with such an excessive cost within a period of 10 years, and I am willing, personally, to extend the time to any reasonable limit, so that no hardship may be imposed upon those who have settled in the West where irrigation is necessary; but I can see no good reason why we should say to the people who have settled upon these lands that the Government of the United States will invest $200,000,000 to make the lands in these arid regions tenantable, advance the money, give the land, and charge no interest. It would be a great injustice to the people of all other sections of the Union.

The argument is being made by those favoring the bill that this is the only place where men living in the densely populated sections of the United States can go to get a home. Well, I can point to 10,000,000 acres of land in Wisconsin that can be bought for a bagatelle in a section of the Union where irrigation is not needed and of tens of millions of acres in the center of the country where civilization is complete and where the rainfall produces the crop, and there is no need for those who are said to live in hovels in cities, and I do not agree that they do so live, to go to these arid regions in order to take up a home if they can find a home in the agricultural regions in the Middle West, where lands can be had at a low price and where no risk whatever has to be run in their cultivation.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. MADDEN. I shall be delighted.

Mr. RAKER. Is not the region the gentleman refers to cut-over or logged-over land; that is, the Government sold it to private individuals and they got the benefit of the timber?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, but I apprehend in the cultivation of land for purely agricultural purposes that they do not need timber on it.

Mr. RAKER. I know; but the land the gentleman referred to had timber on it.

Mr. MADDEN. The land referred to by the gentleman from California, which once was timbered, is now ready for occupation by the man who makes a living by tilling the soil.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Surely.

Mr. HARDY. I ask the gentleman for information. What are the terms on which these settlers buy this land from the Government as to any payment to the Government over and above what the Government spends?

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman refers to this arid land?

Mr. HARDY. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. They do not pay anything at all for the land. The Government spends money for its development. It turns the water over for the use of the farmer, of the settler, and this bill proposes that he shall pay 5 per cent on the original cost to the Government to begin with, and five years later he makes his first payment, which amounts to 5 per cent, and continues on until at the end of 20 years he has paid the Government back the amount the Government expended 20 years before.

Mr. HARDY. Then whose land is it?

Mr. MADDEN. It is the land then of the man who has paid these 5 per cent for 20 years.

Mr. HARDY. Practically the result is that the Government loaned enough money to this man to buy his land, and he paid it back in 20 years?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; and without interest.

Now, there is no man in America who has a tendency toward agriculture who would not be glad to have the Government afford him such opportunity as this. I am a farmer—the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] laughs, but I say I am a farmer—and I have a farm which is conducted scientifically, operated as a farm and not as a hothouse, and I would be glad if the Government would furnish me the money to buy more land, which I would be willing to cultivate if I were not called upon to pay more at the end of 20 years than what the Government had loaned. Yes, I would be glad to pay the Government interest on the money it advanced to me, and so would thousands of other American citizens everywhere throughout the Union.

Mr. FERGUSSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. FERGUSSON. In reference to your assertion that these people could go and get homes in Wisconsin by going there and buying lands, does the gentleman realize when he makes that statement how many millions of men in this country have not a dollar and have not the right to go and settle it and reclaim it?

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, I know that there are millions of men in the United States who have not the money with which to buy land, and I am advocating the loan of money to these men, so that they can buy land in certain sections of the Nation and cultivate crops; and yet the Government refuses to advance it to them, even on the payment of interest. There is no reason why the Government should loan money to people who move onto arid-region land and let them have that money without interest.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. COX. I know the gentleman, from personal experience, goes at a matter as a scientific proposition. I want to ask the gentleman if he has made any figures with a view of seeing how much interest would have accumulated to the Government on the total amount of money the Government advanced at 2 per cent, or even 3 per cent, interest?

Mr. MADDEN. We have loaned them the $80,000,000. We have $20,000,000 more at the disposal of the Department of the Interior, if I understand the situation correctly. That amount at 3 per cent would be $3,000,000. We would have earned from the interest payment on money already expended, as nearly as I can calculate, without pretending to be accurate, something in the neighborhood of $10,000,000 from the beginning of the project up to the present time.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion? Let me suggest to the gentleman that the Government has not loaned even a dollar—not a nickel; has not loaned a cent.

Mr. MADDEN. What the Government has done is this——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The Government has simply gone out and tried to build 32 Government reclamation projects, and has invited innocent poor people to come and settle under them, and has told them they could get the land for $10 or $15 an acre. Now, the overhead charges have mounted from $20 to $50 an acre, and they are asking the poor people there to pay it, and they can not do it.

Mr. MADDEN. The statement of the gentleman from Colorado ought not to go unanswered. The gentleman's statement would lead the House and the country to believe that the Government of the United States, whatever mysterious being that might be presumed to be, began an agitation for the development of the arid lands of the West, and suggested that it would like, as a Government, to irrigate the lands, and it put red-lined advertisements in all the newspapers of the United States advising would-be settlers upon irrigated arid lands to come and take the land at Government expense.

Now, the trouble is that the gentlemen coming from the arid regions, and speaking for the people of those regions on the floor of this House, came here as enthusiastic advocates of irrigation projects, and begged on bended knees and pleaded with all the eloquence which they possessed for the development of the territory in which they lived, and promised all kinds of things to get votes to pass the bill that has put us in the condition in which we are to-day.

Now, that is true, and I do not think the statement of the gentleman from Colorado would leave the situation as it ought to have been left. We went on at their earnest solicitation. They were honest in their advocacy of these measures. They believed they could accomplish certain results. They were mistaken in their belief, and the Government of the United States found itself investing vast sums of money to build water projects in order that these lands might be irrigated.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado: Now, has any farmer in the United States ever had a word to say of the expenditure of one dollar of that money? Answer that, yes or no.

Mr. MADDEN. Which farmer?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Any settler under any project. Has he ever been consulted for one minute about the expenditure of that $86,000,000?

Mr. MADDEN. No; I do not suppose he has.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Of course he has not. He has had no more to do with it than you have.

Mr. MADDEN. If he has not, he has not had much.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. He has not had anything to do with it.

Mr. MADDEN. But gentlemen, like the gentleman from Colorado, are the ones who are responsible for that condition. They came here on the floor of this House and made everybody believe they could make a garden out of a wilderness; that you could do it for a nominal expenditure of public money; that everybody who went onto this arid land watered at Government expense would become rich in no time. And we allowed the Department of the Interior to accept the money coming from the sale of public lands and to expend that money for the development of these irrigation projects. And we found ourselves in the predicament of having begun projects that were impossible of perfection, and we had to appoint a committee of the Senate and of the House and a commission of Army engineers to go out and overlook and revise the work of the Department of the Interior, where it failed, either by lack of knowledge or because of its lack of patriotism, and we were obliged to call a halt. And now we are asked again to continue our confidence in the Department of the Interior and to continue to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to expend moneys received from the sale of public lands in the development of irrigation projects without coming to Congress to tell us why or where or when.

Now, personally, I have the greatest confidence in the Secretary of the Interior, no matter who he may be. But he is human, and he has too much to do, and he can not know; and whoever he may be himself he undoubtedly has under him men who are not always filled with that degree of patriotism which permits the economic expenditure of the public funds, and they have not been expended economically on these irrigation projects. On the contrary, there has been reckless extravagance with the public funds, without the accomplishment of the kind of work that we had the right to hope for.

And while I do believe that we ought to develop these lands and give the people the opportunity to settle upon them, I believe that this legislation, before it is finally enacted, should provide that no money shall be expended on these projects by the Secretary of the Interior, or under his direction, unless he comes with an estimate of the cost of the annual necessary expenditure for their development to the Committee on Appropriations of the House, and that such money as he may require for the expenditure in any given fiscal year shall be authorized by the Congress. We have had no control over the expenditures. We have abdicated our rights and we have created a condition which is unjustifiable.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. I am studying this question for the first time. Are there any other public lands that are given to settlers absolutely without money and without price?

Mr. MADDEN. Absolutely no other public lands within the confines of the United States.

Mr. HARDY. Is there any logic in the proposition that the Government should take lands and make them worth the very highest price and then give them away without money and without price?

Mr. MADDEN. There is neither logic nor reason nor right nor justice in it. And while I favor the most hearty cooperation along legitimate, decent business lines with the people of the arid West in the development of the lands of that section of the country, I believe I would be failing in the performance of my duty under my oath of office if I did not insist that every year the Interior Department shall be compelled to come to the Committee on Appropriations, just as the War Department does, just as the State Department, and as all the other departments do, and state what they want to expend for this purpose, and state why they want to expend it, and make an estimate of the cost and give an opportunity to the committee to examine those in charge of the expenditures.

That is the legitimate, decent business way to conduct this affair, and it is the only way in which it can be successfully and honestly conducted.

Now, I do not want what I have said to be construed as in opposition to this bill, except in so far as I believe the bill as at present drawn does not safeguard the public rights, for I have as much sympathy with these dwellers in the arid West as any man in this House has. I believe that sympathy, however, ought not to be the guiding consideration in reaching a conclusion on so great a matter as this. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I thank you, gentlemen, for the courtesy you have shown me.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, the reclamation act was passed a little over 12 years ago; to be exact, it was approved on June 17, 1902. With your permission, I desire to sketch briefly the history of irrigation in the United States in order that it may be understood why our national irrigation policy was adopted—a policy new to this Government and as yet imperfectly appreciated by many of our citizens. I shall then discuss the particulars wherein the reclamation act has failed to realize the high hopes of its authors entirely and will point out how the bill that is before you supplements the original act to the advantage of both the Government and the settlers under the reclamation projects.

But few Americans who reside east of the Great Plains and the Missouri River know anything definite about irrigation or the laws and customs that prevail in irrigated countries. They have had no occasion to learn, since the eastern half of the United States is blessed with an abundant rainfall. Nor is there a tradition among them on this subject, because they or their ancestors all came from western Europe, one of the well-watered regions of the earth.

Our language is derived from a foggy island in the North Atlantic, where most of the tillable land has been obtained by draining marshes and fens. The Bible is the only great work in all English literature that correctly expresses the spirit of those who dwell in the land of little rain, and it is often misinterpreted by men who do not understand the meaning of "living waters."

Our laws are likewise founded on the common law of England, and riparian rights to the flow of streams were recognized from the very beginning by the colonists on the Atlantic coast. For nearly a century after the Revolution the entire energy of the American people was devoted to the settlement of that part of the United States where rainfall is plentiful. But finally the great wave of immigration reached as far west as the one hundredth meridian, which approximately coincides with the line of 20-inch rainfall, and was there halted. Beyond that line lay the arid West.

While it is true that in at least two-thirds of the land area of the world irrigation is necessary in order to produce crops, yet this was the first time that men of our race had been confronted with such a problem. Anglo-Saxon irrigation began in the Salt Lake Valley 77 years ago, when the Mormon pioneers first diverted the waters of City Creek onto the thirsty soil of Utah. The habits of cooperation which the Mormons had learned in Illinois and Missouri enabled them, under wise leadership, to promptly develop an irrigation system that made life possible in an otherwise fruitless land.

To the union colony at Greeley, Colo., belongs the credit of the next advance by men of our race in irrigation. It has been said that these followers of Horace Greeley transplanted the spirit of a New England town meeting to the far West and again demonstrated the great truth that by the combined efforts of men the most difficult problems can be solved. The success of this colony inspired numerous irrigation enterprises until now Colorado ranks first in the area of land under canals.

The successes that I have mentioned caused the pioneers all over the arid West to turn their attention to the advantages of irrigation. They were men without means, so that the first irrigation works were necessarily primitive. But as time went on capitalists from the Eastern States became interested in irrigation enterprises. During the irrigation boom which occurred from 1885 to 1893, large sums of money were invested in the hope of extraordinary returns. The promoters of these schemes, however, overlooked a fundamental fact that is true of every irrigation system in the world. There can be no permanent peace and no real agricultural prosperity where the ownership of the water or the means of conveying it is separated from the land to be irrigated. Where water means life it is not safe and has never been found practicable to permit its control by others than those who use it. Any plan that does not provide for the ultimate ownership of the irrigation system by the water users under it is foredoomed to failure.

From almost the very beginning the corporations organized to operate canals were engaged in litigation with the farmers. The laws of the States or the decisions of the courts soon declared such companies to be common carriers and prohibited them from charging more than a reasonable rate for the service rendered. Most of the canal companies were overcapitalized, and when they were unable to earn the dividends that had been anticipated western irrigation stocks and bonds received a bad name in the money markets of the world. The failure of most of such enterprises was not due to any lack of feasibility from an engineering point of view, but because they violated the true conception which has been so well stated by Elwood Mead—

That water is public property; that whoever diverts it is a public servant; that whoever uses it in irrigation is a public benefactor; and that rights to the control of streams can only be exercised wisely and safely under public supervision.

When people were few and water in the streams comparatively plentiful no thought was given to water rights, but each individual or association dug its own ditches and appropriated such quantity of water as was needed. But with increasing settlement the time came when there was not water enough in the streams to irrigate all the lands. A series of wet years would breed overconfidence, so that when the dry years came some lands had to go without water. This condition led to disputes, sometimes even to bloodshed. The court calendars were crowded with lawsuits over water. Not only did the farmer lose directly by the drouth, but often what remained of his substance was expended in attorney fees and court costs defending his water rights.

The very necessity of the situation required that some system for the equitable distribution of water be devised, and this was done with more or less success by the legislatures of the Western States and Territories. The English doctrine of riparian rights was almost universally abandoned and the new principle of appropriation substituted in its place. With this change came the idea that the water should be wedded to the land, and that the first in use should be the first in right.

The various irrigation enterprises in the West were widely separated. The Federal Constitution confers no jurisdiction on Congress over the streams within the States, except where navigable rivers are used in interstate and foreign commerce. Consequently there is no uniform irrigation code in the West, but each State has passed laws to meet its particular needs. Wyoming ranks first in the excellence of its laws on this subject. Colorado, Idaho, Utah, and Montana have also successfully solved the problem.

The State of California, however, presents a striking illustration of the conflict between the legal theories that exist in humid and in arid countries. Northern California is well watered, while the average annual rainfall in Southern California is less than 20 inches, so there has been a diversity of interests which is clearly reflected in the statutes of that State. The antagonistic doctrines of appropriation and riparian rights were both recognized, and the result is that its water laws have in reality been written by the courts. Innumerable lawsuits have been tried and the judges have, by their decisions, finally brought order out of chaos. I venture to say that if the money that has been spent in California on water litigation had been devoted to the construction of new irrigation enterprises homes would have been provided for at least a hundred thousand people.

When the early Spanish explorers arrived in what we now call the Southwest they found the Indians watering their crops and observed evidences of ancient aqueducts, which proved that irrigation has been practiced in that region from prehistoric times. There is a canal at Las Cruces, N. Mex., that we know has continuously watered the same land since before the Pilgrim Fathers landed at Plymouth Rock or the Jamestown colony was founded.

The Americans who came into Arizona and New Mexico after the Mexican War soon learned the art of irrigation from the natives. In both Territories the Spanish laws and customs relating to water for irrigation were in a measure recognized by the early legislatures. Arizona, however, borrowed from California the method of settling disputes over water rights by litigation. The idea that the distribution of water is a ministerial rather than a judicial function has never been adopted in my State. In the valley where I was born there have been many bitterly contested lawsuits, but finally the irrigators came to see that instead of quarreling over the meager minimum flow of the stream their only salvation lay in the storage of water that went waste to the sea when the river was at flood.

But as everywhere else in the West the pioneers were poor and the project was so vast that its construction was impossible unless outside help could be obtained. Similar situations had arisen in all of the arid-land States because local development had reached its limit. It was impossible for the States of the arid region to undertake this work because, with more than half their area owned by the Federal Government and therefore not taxable, their sources of revenue were so limited that funds could not be raised for this purpose. Public sentiment soon began to crystallize in favor of national aid for irrigation, and Congress first answered this demand by the passage of the Carey Act in 1894.

Under the terms of the Carey Act each of the arid-land States was granted 1,000,000 acres of desert land on condition that the State should provide for its irrigation. This law was little utilized for a number of years, and even to this date has brought about the reclamation of a comparatively small area out of the total amount of land under irrigation in the West. While there have been other contributing causes, such as the lack of proper engineering supervision by the States, the principal reason for the failure of the Carey Act lies in the fact that interest, often at a high rate, had to be paid on the money borrowed to pay for the construction of irrigation works. It has been exceedingly hard for promoters to finance Carey Act projects because neither the States nor the Federal Government would loan their credit to the enterprises. The promoters were often more interested in their immediate profits than in the ultimate success of the settlers and could not, like a government, wait for time to work its marvels.

All those who had made a study of the situation finally came to an agreement that the only way that the larger western irrigation projects would ever be constructed was by the United States. As the owner of large areas of land, the Federal Government had a proper interest in its development. A population established in these otherwise waste places meant a wider home market for manufactured articles. But, above all, a wise irrigation policy meant the upbuilding of the Nation by providing homes for our own citizens in their own country. These were the compelling reasons that induced Congress to pass the reclamation act in 1902. The act was carefully prepared by men who were familiar with the actual conditions. We who live in the West believe that its fundamental principles are sound, and we are not trying to change them by the bill that is before you.

The reclamation act dedicated the receipts from the sales of public lands in the Western States to the work of reclaiming the desert, and thereby provided a fund that has done and will do wonders for the West. No one who truly desires that the arid region shall continue to develop would change that feature of the law.

The requirement that the cost of all irrigation works shall be returned to the reclamation fund was the height of wisdom: First, because it placed this appropriation in a class by itself, free from the smell of the pork barrel; and, second, because, by this revolving fund, every practicable irrigation project in the entire West will ultimately be developed. No one now proposes to interfere with this excellent plan.

The time has come, however, when, out of our experience, certain amendments to the reclamation act are demonstrated to be necessary. The authors of this act all recognized it to be an experiment, and none presumed to say that it would never need amendment. The bill before you is not a one-sided measure, but is drawn for the benefit of both the Government and the settler.

In the original act no penalty was provided for the failure to pay the construction charges when due. With the time extended to 20 years and the payments graduated, your committee is convinced that the average water user can meet the payments as they fall due. Those who do not should be penalized.

Some have complained that the penalties in this bill are excessive, but upon examination you will find that they are no greater than the penalties for delinquent taxes in most States and not so great as in some Western States. It is necessary that the rate of penalty be higher than the current interest on money. Otherwise the farmer would prefer to owe the United States rather than his local bank in case it was necessary for him to make a loan.

The greatest difficulty about securing the prompt payment of construction charges is that owing to the increased cost of all the projects the annual payments on a 10-year basis are now excessive. As has been explained to you by those who have preceded me, this increased cost is due to a number of reasons; the principal items of increase, as stated by the Reclamation Service, being that works of larger extent were constructed than were first contemplated and that, as we all know, the prices paid for labor and materials have advanced. For instance, in Arizona, on the project where I live, it was understood that the cost would amount to about $25 or $30 an acre. With that understanding the farmers upon the project mortgaged their lands to the United States.

Mr. HENSLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Arizona yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. HAYDEN. With pleasure.

Mr. HENSLEY. Is it not a fact that the testimony taken before the committee that sat at Phoenix for some time in April last year shows that the farmers were led to believe that the charge of the Government would not exceed $15 per acre for impounding the water and furnishing it to them as it got in condition to do so?

Mr. HAYDEN. It is true that the original estimate was $15 an acre for the construction of the Roosevelt Reservoir, but I was referring to figures which included a diversion dam and the distributing system. But the private landowner agreed to pay whatever the cost might be. He mortgaged his farm just as he would to a private individual, and his wife signed the mortgage with him. It is of record that their property is mortgaged to the United States for the amount due as their share of the cost of the project.

As a matter of fact, the construction charge on that land will be more than $60 an acre. But my people are not repudiating the debt. They realize that the project is worth to them all that it has cost. It would be difficult to find anybody who would prefer to return to the old conditions that existed prior to the passage of the reclamation act. What I have said of the Salt River project is true of all the other projects in the United States. There is no desire to escape payment. But the water users come to Congress with this reasonable proposition: That inasmuch as the cost of these projects has in all cases more than doubled, they ask that twice the time be allowed in which to pay the debt.

Mr. HARDY. I think the equity of the farmers for more time is absolutely good, but money costs this Government something, because it owes a great debt and it is paying interest, and 20 years' time on an original investment is worth whatever the Government is paying in interest on its debt. If it is 3 per cent, 20 years is worth 60 per cent additional. That additional amount must be paid by taxes collected from the whole people. Now, under what logic can one set of people ask the rest of the people of the United States not simply and solely to give them a home, but also to give them from $50 to $60 an acre on that home in order to build it up? If they pay back the principal, the rest of the people will be out the amount of the interest.

Mr. HAYDEN. If the gentleman from Texas will pardon me, I have a line of argument here that I should like to present just now. I shall answer his question before I conclude my remarks.

So far as the United States is concerned, another difficulty has arisen in connection with these projects, and that is that certain men, taking advantage of the provisions of the reclamation act, have speculated upon the land in the projects. We have attempted in this bill to cure that evil. As the figures stand to-day, there will ultimately be irrigated under all the Government projects approximately 3,000,000 acres of land. Last year the Reclamation Service was prepared to irrigate 1,290,000 acres. Contracts, however, were made for the payment of operation and maintenance charges for only 942,000 acres, and crops were actually grown on but 721,000 acres of land. These figures tell the story of speculation under the reclamation projects. They show that the owners of between 350,000 and 500,000 acres have preferred to let their lands remain in idleness, out of cultivation, in the hope of selling it unimproved to some future settler. Everybody knows that the reclamation act was not intended to serve any such purpose. The act was designed to make homes for the many, not riches for the few.

Your committee has attempted to prevent the acquisition of this unearned wealth by the following provisions in this bill: First, by providing that under all projects there shall be a minimum operation and maintenance charge, whether the land is cultivated or not. That is to say, that whenever the irrigation works are completed so that water is available for delivery to the land, then the owner of the land shall pay his share of the operation and maintenance of the project whether he cultivates his land or not. The Government has done its part, and the water is ready for his use. It is unfair to the bona fide settlers who are improving their lands that the whole of this burden should be put upon them. I know that I speak for all actual cultivators of the soil in my country in saying that they are in favor of this proposition.

We have also presented in this bill a section requiring that in order to maintain his water rights the landowner or entryman shall cultivate a certain proportion of his land, increasing the amount each succeeding year until three-fourths of the entire area is placed under cultivation. If he fails to do this, it is evident he is holding the land for speculative purposes, and we provide in that event for the forfeiture of his water rights.

Mr. HARDY. Do you forfeit the title to the land?

Mr. HAYDEN. We can not forfeit a man's title to his land if it is in private ownership. If it is public land, his entry can be canceled after the lapse of a certain time, and in that way it can be forfeited.

We also have in this bill a provision which is based upon a recommendation made by a congressional investigating committee that visited certain reclamation projects last year, of which my good friend from Missouri [Mr. HENSLEY], who questioned me a few moments ago, was chairman. That committee pointed out the evil of permitting the owners of large areas of land to bring their holdings within these projects without requiring them to fix in advance the price at which it shall be sold to settlers. We provide that any individual who owns more land than one farm unit, who desires in the future to come under one of these projects, shall agree with the Secretary of the Interior upon the terms on which he will dispose of his excess land. Hereafter it will be impossible for a speculator to reap all the advantage that would come from the enhanced value of his land by reason of its inclusion in a new project. The new settler is entitled to a share in this profit, and we intend to see that he gets it.

As I have stated before, the passage of this bill will be to the mutual advantage of the Government and the water users under the projects. The settler will not only obtain twice the time in which to pay his debt to the United States, but we have graduated his payments so that they are smaller during the early part of the payment period. The farmer is thus given an opportunity to improve his land, to bring it all into cultivation, to purchase live stock, or to have an orchard in bearing before the burden of payments become heavy.

We have provided for a separation of the charges for operation and maintenance from the construction charge, so that hereafter the water user will know the exact use to be made of the money he pays to the Reclamation Service. Under certain conditions we provide that the care and operation of a project may be turned over to the water users under it, and the water users' association may do away with a lot of red tape by acting as the fiscal agent of the Government in the collection of all charges due. These are some of the advantages that this measure contains for the irrigators under the projects. I shall point out other benefits that will accrue to them when we take up the bill section by section.

Now, to answer the question of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY], permit me to say that this fund which we are using to reclaim the desert is not to be considered as the ordinary revenues of the Government. This was explained with the clearness for which he is noted by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], who, when the bill providing for the issue of reclamation bonds in the sum of $20,000,000 was under consideration in 1910, made this statement:

> At the time that the irrigation bill was passed it was contended that the proceeds of the sale of public lands were not subject to the same limitations under the Constitution as moneys derived from taxation, and the bill segregated the moneys arising from the sale of arid lands in 18 Western States and provided that they should be held as a trust fund for the purpose of irrigating and improving the public lands in those States to encourage the building of homes. The Secretary of the Interior became the trustee for the management of this fund, and the bill provided that such projects as were feasible and practicable should be developed and the lands irrigated should be sold to settlers at the cost of the improvement by the Government and the proceeds of such sales should be returned to the trust fund to be again used for irrigation purposes under the trust. At that time the question was raised by some of the ablest Representatives in the House as to whether the proposition to use money derived from the sale of public lands for the purpose of irrigation was constitutional. It was contended by those who advocated the bill that moneys derived from the sale of public lands were a part of the private purse of the Nation; that the public lands of the country had originally been given to the General Government by the State of Virginia, other public lands had been secured by the purchase of the Louisiana Territory from the Government of France, and others had been ceded by the Republic of Mexico after the Mexican War as a war measure; that the original cost of these lands was very little, a large portion of it coming to the Government without any outlay of money; and that the amount paid by the Federal Government to France for the Louisiana Purchase had long since been paid back into the Treasury many times over, and that, therefore, none of the moneys derived from the sale of these lands at the time of the passage of the bill came directly or indirectly from taxes levied on the people.

Mr. HARDY. Would there be any money derived from the sale of these lands if the settlers on them and the parties to whom we sold them were only to pay back what the Government paid out and that in a period of 20 years?

Mr. HAYDEN. The gentleman should understand that there are different land laws.

Mr. HARDY. How about this land?

Mr. HAYDEN. Some of the land in these projects is entered under the desert-land act, and for that the entryman will pay a dollar and a quarter an acre.

Mr. MADDEN. And they take money from the sale of other lands and put it into this fund.

Mr. HAYDEN. About $4,000,000 was derived from the sale of the public land last year.

Mr. HARDY. The Government not only gets nothing for this land to start out with, but it spends a hundred dollars an acre for it.

Mr. HAYDEN. That is done on the same theory that land is given to the settlers without cost and without price under the homestead law. It is for the benefit of all the people of the United States, not to make a profit out of the public domain, not to use it as a source of revenue, but to provide homes for our people. The only way we can make homes for anybody on most of the remaining public land is to irrigate it.

Mr. EVANS. Will the gentleman allow me to make this suggestion, that a part of the money that comes to this fund comes from the sale of coal lands, from the sale of timberlands, from the sale of phosphate lands, and other lands, for which the Government charges a certain price.

Mr. HAYDEN. I thank the gentleman from Montana for bringing out that fact. Now, let me continue the quotation from Mr. UNDERWOOD:

> The congressional debates in the early history of our Government show that Congress at that time recognized a very marked distinction between the right to dispose of public moneys derived by taxation and the disposition of public lands or the proceeds thereof. Most of the Representatives in Congress in the first half century of our national existence were strict constructionists as to the power of the Government to expend moneys derived from taxation for any other purposes than those within the governmental powers enumerated in the Constitution; but these same Representatives were very liberal in the disposition of public lands for other purposes. In the beginning they gave the sixteenth section of each township of land to the States and Territories for school purposes, and afterwards gave the thirty-second section for the same purpose. They followed that by giving public lands to promote the building of canals in the country, and at a later period large donations of public lands were conveyed to railroad companies, as a direct gift, for the purpose of building railroads and improving the country.

If we can give away the public domain to the extent of 140,000,000 acres, which has been done under the homestead law, does it not logically follow that we can give away the money received from the same source, or we can loan it without interest? It is merely a question of the best public policy. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] contends that we can not justify a loan to farmers without interest in one part of the country and refuse to loan money to farmers in another part of the country with interest. I have no controversy with him on that general proposition. If we came to the Treasury of the United States and asked for the loan of money derived from the general revenues of the Government, and if it was necessary for the Government to borrow money to make up the amount loaned, then, of course, we ought to pay interest. But the money in the reclamation fund is of a peculiar character. The sums received from the sale of public lands are so small that if divided among the States and loaned to farmers practically no relief would be afforded. I stand ready to vote for any well-considered rural credit bill that may be offered to this House. To charge interest on the reclamation fund will benefit nobody.

Here we have a fund derived solely from the sale of public lands and a part of the private purse of the Nation. If we can properly give the land itself away, we can loan the money received from the proceeds without interest or give the money away. You can not escape that reasoning. On the other hand, if you follow the argument which the gentleman from Illinois has made to its logical conclusion, we ought to repeal the homestead law. We should consider the public lands as an asset of the Government and endeavor to obtain all we can for them. We should offer them for sale to the highest bidder and thus increase the revenues of the Government.

But such a policy has not been followed. We have sold lands for a nominal sum, or given them away, upon condition that the settlers shall make homes for themselves and families. We have about reached the limit of available public lands and we can not provide any more new homes for our citizens now unless it is on irrigated lands. One-half of the area of the reclamation projects is public land that would otherwise be not cultivated or made into homes for our people. A wise public policy makes it necessary that this plan be continued.

If interest is to be charged we must follow the plan inaugurated in Europe of amortizing the debt and extending it over 50 or 60 years. Twenty years is a reasonable time in which to expect the repayment of the cost of reclamation projects if no interest is charged. The government of no other country in the world has attempted to collect agricultural loans in so short a time as 10 years. The small-holdings act of 1907 passed by the British Parliament provides for a repayment period of 50 years. The estates commission and congested districts boards in Ireland make loans for 62 years. In the State of Victoria, Australia, they are so anxious to get settlers that they not only give away the public domain, but they level it, put it in crops, spend money for houses, and teach the new settler how to cultivate his land. Under the Victorian closer-settlement act the period of repayment is 32 years.

The principal European nations all provide for loans to agricultural associations. In Italy the period of repayment is 35 years, in Austria 54½ years, in Switzerland 50 years, while in Hungary the National Small Holdings Land Mortgage Institute makes loans for a period of 65 years.

It is unnecessary for us to follow such a policy in this country, because our people are not so poor as the European peasants. It is only fair, however, considering the hardships that the settlers in the West are compelled to endure, and considering the benefit that they confer on the whole Nation by making the desert habitable and productive, that we should advance money for the construction of irrigation works without interest. The remission of an interest charge on this money can properly be considered a donation by the United States in behalf of the general welfare.

We ought to consider ourselves fortunate that a fund is available for the development of the West without expense to the taxpayer. All other internal improvements by the Government are paid for out of the Treasury without reimbursement. Anyone who will examine into this question thoroughly will see that the general public is benefited by an increase in the production of foodstuffs. The construction of irrigation projects directly affects the meat supply of this country. The alfalfa fields of the West are all used to fatten the stock that is brought in from the ranges, and if it were not for the fact that we now have over 13,000,000 acres of irrigated land we would be still more embarrassed by the high cost of living.

We believe it is better policy to loan this money without interest so as to get the principal back as quickly as we can. The returned money can then be used to construct other irrigation works and thus provide homes for more people and continue the development of the country.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does not that raise the question whether the same amount of money and the same amount of energy expended on land that is naturally productive and does not need irrigation would give a larger return?

Mr. HAYDEN. I doubt it as a matter of fact. The amount of money available from the sale of public lands is so small that if you once attempted to distribute it over the entire farming area of the United States it would accomplish nothing.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is not the basis of your claim this: That you think the money belongs to that locality because it came from the public domain of that locality and ought to be expended there? I differ completely there with the gentleman. I believe the public domain belongs to all the people of the United States and not to the State in which it happens to be situated.

Mr. HAYDEN. That being the case, would the gentleman advocate obtaining as large a sum as possible from the sale of it?

Mr. SHERLEY. I might and might not; it would depend upon whether I considered it particularly desirable to have homesteads made on it. I do not consider that it is particularly desirable to spend a great amount of money in making arid land capable of producing crops when we have a great deal of land already capable of producing crops that is not being employed. If we were crowded for land, the gentleman's proposition would have more merit, but we are not, and what the gentleman is proposing is that we constantly stimulate immigration into a section which is less worthy of development than other sections of the country.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I shall not argue with the gentleman whether my section of the country is more worthy of development than his, because I know that our pride in our States is such that we would never reach an agreement; but if we follow the gentleman's argument to its logical conclusion, we ought never to have passed the homestead law; we ought to have held the public land as a private individual or a speculator would in order to obtain the highest possible price for it.

Mr. SHERLEY. What we did was to take land that was peculiarly adaptable for settlement and get it settled up, and there was a reason, not only economic but national, in favor of developing the West; but now you have got to a point where you have land that is not worth giving away unless a great deal of money is spent on it, and that raises a question of whether, having other land that is worth developing, we ought to spend the money on these arid lands and offer the tremendous inducement that you are offering of principal without interest.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Arizona yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. FALCONER. Where in the United States may people now get free good land?

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, I did not say that they could get it by having it given to them; but if you will pass a law saying that the people of my State can get from the Government without interest money necessary to buy land, they will buy land in my State, and a great deal of land that is not now in cultivation will be put in cultivation.

Mr. FALCONER. Yes; but I would observe that a great deal of the uncultivated land there, and a great deal of the uncultivated land within 100 miles of the National Capital, to which reference has been made this afternoon, is not worth taking as a gift, and that as compared to some of the land in the West after it is developed, say, for 10 or 20 years, the eastern land is not so productive.

Mr. SHERLEY. If it is so very profitable, then men would jump at the chance to get the loan and pay interest.

Mr. FALCONER. It takes time, of course, to get the land improved, even under Government help. Adverting to a previous remark of the gentleman, I was wondering if the gentleman figured that land in Texas was public land, or if it belonged to the State.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman knows the history of America, he will know how Texas happened to come into the Union.

Mr. FALCONER. I do.

Mr. SHERLEY. And that the rule that would apply to the public domain of the West would not apply to the State of Texas.

Mr. FALCONER. That is true.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then the gentleman's question does not need an answer.

Mr. FALCONER. There are certain rights in certain States, and the money derived from certain natural resources, some argue, ought to go to a certain extent for the benefit of the State.

Mr. SHERLEY. I know a great deal of the Northwest country became a part of the Union as a result of the energy, courage, and heroism of the people of my State, and I feel that their descendants have an interest in that public domain, and that they have not surrendered it to the few people who have gone out into those Western States.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, there is one other argument that has been advanced by way of amendment to this bill that I should like to discuss in the few remaining minutes of my time. It has been said by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] that this bill should be amended to provide for annual estimates by the Secretary of the Interior of the expenditures to be made from the reclamation fund. The act as passed in 1902 made a continuing appropriation. Whatever sums of money received from the sale of public lands may now be expended by the Secretary in the reclamation of arid lands without his coming to Congress for an annual appropriation. I believe that I can speak in fairness on this matter, because the projects in my State are so far advanced that they must be completed under any system of estimates and appropriation.

It seems to me that the record of this Congress, and of past Congresses, on appropriations is not such that we can boast that there would be a material advantage in changing the system. All regular appropriations are made available on July 1, at the beginning of each fiscal year. On any ordinary public work, where the money is not reimbursable, it may be said that it is immaterial whether the appropriation is made at one time or another, because the loss falls on the Government. But in the case of a reclamation project with a large number of farmers absolutely dependent upon the prompt completion of the irrigation works and making their plans accordingly, if we were to repeat the spectacle that we have here to-day of great appropriation bills not yet passed that ought to have been approved long ago, then we will be placing a burden of suffering on a people that already have assumed all the hardships that they should be expected to bear.

There is no inherent virtue in passing a bill through the Appropriations Committee; that process does not necessarily mean economy. Until we adopt a budget system so that we can limit appropriations to certain amounts, and know that this limitation will not only apply in this House but also to another body, I can not see any particular advantage in having the expenditures from the reclamation fund passed upon by the Committee on Appropriations. If a budget were adopted, I should not so much object to this change.

The Secretary of the Interior is now limited by the amount of this fund, and it is in his discretion as to where it shall be expended. One of the troubles with the original reclamation act was that section 9 provided that the major portion of the money should be expended in the States from which it came. The result was that the Secretary of the Interior, in order to carry out the spirit of the act, began the construction of 32 projects, some of them in places where they were not warranted. When the bonding act was passed, in 1910, that section was repealed, as it was seen to be vicious.

It is now proposed that we go back to the same old system and make the expenditure of this fund dependent upon the political influence of Members of this House rather than leave it to the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior. It has been seriously argued that we would save large sums of money in our river and harbor appropriations if a lump sum were given to some department or commission with directions to expend it as they saw best from an engineering point of view, rather than to leave it contingent upon the passage of a bill in which every Member of the House and Senate is interested. Somebody must show me where there is more virtue and more economy in the mere fact of getting a bill through the Appropriations Committee than to leave the expenditure of a limited sum to the discretion of a responsible Secretary, a member of the Cabinet who has pride in his work.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit.

Mr. HAYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. There has been no undertaking of the same magnitude as the Panama Canal. That, of course, the gentleman will admit?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Every appropriation that has been made for that canal, beyond the initial appropriation at the time of the purchase of the canal rights from the French company, has been made through estimates submitted to the Committee on Appropriations, and by annual appropriation. If the gentleman is familiar with the history of the building of the canal he will know there has not been a year since those estimates were submitted to the Committee on Appropriations that the appropriation was not much under the amount that was estimated, and the greatest physical undertaking of mankind has been conducted practically without waste and scandal. Now, can the gentleman show anything like that or approaching that with reference to the Reclamation Service that has been beyond the control of Congress?

Mr. HAYDEN. I can say this, that the officials of the Reclamation Service claim that the expenditures made under their direction have been no more wasteful, and, in fact, more economical, than the ordinary governmental expenditures.

Mr. SHERLEY. My only answer to that is that that is the most severe indictment of governmental expenditures that I have ever heard of, because if the rest of the Government is as bad as the Reclamation Service, it is high time we should get a new form of government.

Mr. HAYDEN. I have never had an opportunity to thoroughly investigate the expenditures of the Reclamation Service. I understand that a superficial investigation has lately been conducted by a subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, but for some mysterious reason the hearings have not been printed, so that the ordinary Member of this House has had no opportunity to study the facts that have been developed. I have been fortunate enough to secure one copy of a summary of the testimony, which was evidently prepared by a Member who has no personal knowledge of irrigation. I understand that at this hearing the engineers of the Reclamation Service claimed that the expenditures of the service based on the unit of cost of moving earth, stone, and other material, has been no higher, and not as high in many cases, as the expense of similar work by private corporations and much cheaper than other governmental work of like character.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will say to the gentleman that I just recently had an appeal made to me by one of the chief champions of the bill, one of the men who went as a member of the committee to investigate it, and his argument to me to vote for the bill was that there had been such a tremendous unnecessary cost placed upon these farmers as to compel relief to be given to them now.

Mr. HAYDEN. I would have the gentleman from Kentucky to distinctly understand that I am not here to defend any waste or extravagant expenditures that may have been made by the Reclamation Service. Of course, as in all other Government work, money has been spent in a useless and improper manner by this service. I know of such instances from my own observation. But the question at issue here, however, is not what ought to be done about the mistakes of the past, but whether the submission of estimates by the Reclamation Service and annual appropriations by Congress will cure the evil. I can see nothing in our present methods, as exemplified by other congressional appropriations, to indicate that any saving would be effected.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, let me say that in common with every water user on the Federal reclamation projects, I am indeed glad that after a long and wearisome delay we have at last begun the discussion of this measure in the House. I ventured a prediction about a month ago that this bill would pass the House by the 15th of July. As prophets go, I was fairly accurate in that the discussion of the bill was commenced on yesterday. I sincerely trust that we will conclude the general debate to-day, so that we can take up this measure next Wednesday, under the five-minute rule, and pass it.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID] is recognized for 25 minutes.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am very glad the relief sought is freely recognized as not being a merely local question confined to a congressional district or one State. Its extensive geographical scope makes it a great national question. It is also politically treated as a national question. I am glad to acknowledge my appreciation of the firm support being given this bill by the Department of the Interior, which presumably correctly represents the attitude of the present administration. Had the Republican national ticket succeeded in the last election there would have also been an administration bill, just such a bill as this, for enactment. It also goes without saying that if the Progressive national ticket had won, the reclamation act would have received the fostering care of the administration of Theodore Roosevelt, because the original act was passed under his administration, assisted by his ardent support. No political party has ever taken a stand against this act, and I am glad no partisan politics is involved in this relief bill. The Republican administration had found by experience of the Interior Department, and I may say a practical demonstration by water users, that this relief by the extension of time from 10 to 20 years was necessary. That was clearly demonstrated, and has been confirmed by the many figures, statements, and reports which the Department of the Interior has from time to time given to the public.

Mr. Chairman, this bill constitutes the present paramount legislative interest of approximately the west one-half of the United States. It is not merely the particular localities now under irrigation which are vitally concerned, but as well the unirrigated country surrounding those localities, and especially as well the many towns to which these irrigated vicinities are tributary.

The bill is not the product or draft of any single Member of Congress, neither of any official. Its provisions represent the consensus of opinion on the one hand of the Secretary of the Interior and his able and experienced corps of reclamation officials, including engineers, legal advisers, and other valuable help——

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Certainly.

Mr. RAKER. In addition to the Members of Congress from the Western States, practically all of them, is it not a fact that the Senators from the various States also participated in this conference with all those interested in the administration?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. The gentleman from California is entirely correct.

Mr. RAKER. And not only one but many conferences were had on this bill, and it was gone over thoroughly before it was presented to the House?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. It must have been deliberated two or three months before it was drafted, and then it went to the committees and was thoroughly considered by the committees, and it was so acceptable as drafted that it passed the Senate without any resistance whatever.

Mr. Chairman, I had been about to state when I yielded to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] that Senators and House Members from all the irrigation States, and especially the members of the Senate and House Irrigation Committees, participated with the Secretary of the Interior and his very capable and experienced corps of reclamation officials in deliberations had upon the preparation of the bill, the Secretary himself officiating as chairman of the conferences.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. With pleasure.

Mr. RAKER. Is it not a fact that while there has been considerable complaint from the farmers on these projects they were called here a year ago last summer, and were here a couple of months, as representatives from each project, and full hearings were had before the Secretary of the Interior, and volumes of testimony taken, and that this bill is practically the result of that conference, as well as the other one just named, between the Members of the House and Members of the Senate?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska I thank the gentleman from California for calling my attention to that. I intended to make that very statement of fact and tell of the long, arduous, painstaking, highly capable, and thorough investigation that was conducted by the Secretary of the Interior in order to ascertain what might be expedient to be done for settlers. The Secretary was most faithful and able in the discharge of this self-imposed official duty. The Secretary reached the conclusion which was inevitable upon the evidence. Besides hearing from the lips of the water users themselves of their efforts and experiences and as to existing conditions the Secretary made an extended tour, seeing for himself most of the projects. I shall read what the Secretary says upon that subject in his annual report.

The Secretary says:

> We mistook the ability of the farmer to pay for his water rights. Ten years was the time given. His optimism and our own was too great. The time should be doubled.

Please observe this further statement of the Secretary, which I read:

> This should be done not alone because of the inability of many to meet their obligations to the Government but because it will prove a wise policy to give a free period in which the farmers may more fully use their farms.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield right there? Is it not a fact—and I want it from the gentleman, if it is within his knowledge—that one of the reasons that has raised the cost of these projects is that when they first estimated they simply estimated for a dam and a main ditch, and since that time practically each project has added a distributing system, and there are hydroelectric plants and other drainage systems that were absolutely necessary, and hence the price of the project has been doubled, and having doubled the price of the project, these men ought to have additional time for payment?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Nobody is better informed on that, I take it, than the gentleman from California, but I would answer in the affirmative the question which he has asked. I will just state in that connection that on the North Platte project the first estimate there was $35, but it was increased first $10, making it $45, and subsequently increased $10, making it $55——

Mr. RAKER. Right in that connection I want the gentleman to explain to the House whether or not it is a fact that when they raised the estimate it was done by virtue of their putting in a distributing system to deliver water to the farmers, when, as a matter of fact, the original only contained the estimate for a main ditch?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. I do not doubt the gentleman is correct about that, but I am not sufficiently informed to answer on that particular point.

Mr. Chairman, 25 or 30 years ago some publicist said, "America is another name for opportunity." Nothing could have been more truly expressed with reference to the boundless opportunities for legitimate endeavor, but especially for homesteading, home securing, and home building in the yet unsettled portions of Iowa, Minnesota, Nebraska, Kansas, and the Dakotas, within the humid limits.

Mr. Chairman, for the several years preceding the enactment of this reclamation law in 1902 opportunity for the securing of homes on the public lands and the extension of agricultural development in the United States had well nigh become exhausted. I mean such opportunity had become almost exhausted in the humid regions of the West; and what was to be done about it? Were our people to be allowed to emigrate to Canada, Australia, or to some other new country, where they would find agricultural lands blessed with adequate rainfall or irrigated by the State?

Mr. Chairman, the result of this ascertainment and the agitation which followed was that the people of the semiarid West appealed to the Congress for a national irrigation law, providing that the funds arising from public-land sales be used in the development of irrigation projects, and the result was the act of 1902.

Mr. Chairman, the membership has been fully advised of the extent of the delinquencies in water-right payments, and I shall not here take the time to go into figures upon this question.

Mr. Chairman, the able and distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] in the remarks he has made freely accords that the time for making water-right payments should be extended from 10 to 20 years, and the views he expresses show him to be well grounded upon this question. He seems to be convinced, as the Secretary of the Interior and the members of both committees and many other Members of the Senate and House are convinced, that such an extension of the time of payment is a necessity. I personally appreciate the approval of the gentleman from Illinois of this, the main feature of the bill, but I do regret that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who has already spoken, and some others, should be impressed that a rider should be imposed upon the extension of time in the form of interest payment.

I contend that interest payment is not tenable at all. I contend that it would be thoroughly and fundamentally repugnant to the original act. I contend that rather than to impose the requirement of interest payment we had better introduce an act to repeal the reclamation act, because interest charge must make its operation a failure.

Mr. Chairman, when the act was passed it was determined it would not be an interest-paying proposition, because it would not endure the payment of interest. It was only because the projects which the Government has taken up and set on foot were not feasible at all as business propositions from a private-investment standpoint that Congress passed the reclamation act and assumed the onus of furnishing the money to settlers without interest. Private capital would only invest where the payment of interest or the return of dividends were assured; where reputable irrigation engineers had ascertained that large or reasonable dividends would be realized. Practically all such feasible projects had already been secured by private capital. The question thus arose whether the development and the increase of population in the western country should be encouraged by Government aid. It was granted that private capital would never undertake the development of what the Government has since undertaken, and that it was not an interest or dividend paying proposition to start with. Mr. Chairman, the arrangement does not constitute a borrowing by water users. Water users are simply going in on the cooperative plan with the Government for the general development of the country. Water users have joined hands with their Government to do something not only for their individual private interests, but for the public interest as well.

The act provides for a policy for internal improvement, looking to a great ultimate good. The Government does not expect to reap immediate advantage. It would be idle to contend for that. But the Government had to undertake this and do this much, allowing money to be used without interest or without any returns, or else allow these fertile lands of the West—which they are, when water is put upon them—to lie idle and unproductive. It is an act to reclaim the desert, to make the unproductive desert productive. And, Mr. Chairman, it is an act also to build up citizenship.

What constitutes a State?
Men, high-minded men.

It is for the benefit of the State and the Nation that we build up our citizenship, and the surest foundation is to secure to them comfortable and profitable homes.

Mr. Chairman, it is not legitimate or fair at all to impose interest payment. To impose interest charge would break the majority of water users; some of them, of course, would survive because they were well-to-do when they took up the land.

Mr. Chairman, I want to read this particular plank from the Republican platform, based upon the experience of the Interior Department:

We favor the continuance of the policy of the Government with regard to the reclamation of arid lands; and for the encouragement of the speedy settlement and improvement of such lands—

Mark the words:

For the encouragement of the speedy settlement and improvement of such lands.

We favor an amendment to the law that will reasonably extend the time within which the cost of any reclamation project may be repaid by the landowners under it.

I want also to read from the report of the Secretary of the Interior upon the same point. He says:

I feel the keenest sympathy with those who are upon these projects, who are entering upon this work of putting the desert into public service.

The Secretary of the Interior recognizes that the water users are not only helping themselves in a private way, but are doing a public service, and these reasons are my justification for saying that this is a cooperative plan. These pioneers, helping to develop these lands, are citizen patriots doing a great public service to help develop this country, so that it will cope in population, agricultural production, and power with the other countries of the globe.

We were told in the excellent speech by Mr. Mead, who was at one time in the Reclamation Service here, and who had previously been the highest reclamation officer in the State of Wyoming, when I had the pleasure to know him—he stated in his speech delivered at Denver at the irrigation convention this season that the United States is in competition with Australia, New Zealand, and Argentina for population, in substance. Mr. Mead meant, too, that the kind of laws and policies we applied to irrigation and the manner of help accorded water users would largely determine the question of our supremacy over these competing countries with respect to the settlement and development and production and prosperity of the semiarid regions of the several countries. Mr. Mead explained wherein foreign countries had done and were doing so much more for irrigation by giving the water user a good start and more favorable terms throughout than the United States has undertaken to do for its water users.

While water users in the United States will cheerfully repay to the Government the full cost of construction if they may be afforded reasonable time in which to make the money, or a good portion of it, from the use of the lands irrigated, the State of Victoria, in Australia carries permanently for water users the full cost of construction, requiring from water users annual payments which would be equivalent to a reasonable income on the investment made by the State. So water users in Victoria can invest in live stock and other personal property the $25 or $50 or $75 or more per acre, which a permanent water right costs in the United States, and presumably about the same cost obtains in Victoria. The consequence is that the permanent investment the water user in Victoria has in the land is small, indeed, as compared with the permanent investment the American water user will have in the land when his water right has been paid for. The great advantage the Victoria water user has over the water user in the United States will be obvious to everyone. It is not only that the water user in Victoria is permitted to invest and carry in live stock and other personal property the greater portion of his wealth, but the taxable valuation of his land will be so much lower than the irrigated farm in the United States where the cost of construction charge becomes a permanent investment in the land.

It was not a remarkable or exceptionable arrangement on the part of our Government to provide irrigation out of public-land funds without requiring the homesteader to pay interest. I have just pointed out that Australia has gone away ahead of us in this respect, and I should add New Zealand and in some particular respects should add also Canada, but the Canadian Government does not directly itself develop irrigation projects.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. EVANS. Is it not a fact that many of these projects are used for the purpose of retaining the flood waters that otherwise would do damage as they flow down untrammeled through the valleys of this country?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Yes; certainly. The gentleman from Montana is correct. They do a great service in that respect and will help to avoid the necessity of large appropriations for the improvement of rivers and the construction of levees.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman state a case where an irrigation reservoir has materially prevented floods in the valleys below? Will the gentleman name just one?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. I had rather refer the question to an expert irrigation engineer—yes; I yield to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. EVANS].

Mr. SHERLEY. You say that that has happened. I want to know of a river where that has happened. All the far West is represented here.

Mr. EVANS. I would not undertake to name one, because very few of those irrigation projects are at the present time completed. But it is a notorious fact that it is the expectation of engineers that when these large bodies of water are impounded the damage below that point will be lessened by the regulation of the flow of this water.

Mr. SHERLEY. All the irrigation is in arid lands, in the arid region?

Mr. EVANS. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Do you have floods in the arid regions?

Mr. EVANS. Yes; when the spring floods come along they come all the way down to the Mississippi River, and they do damage as far down as New Orleans. The construction of these irrigation projects will stop the damage all the way down from St. Louis to New Orleans.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. TAGGART. We have a dam on the Platte River in Wyoming. That dam, I believe, is 270 feet high, is it not?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. It is higher than that, but I have forgotten the exact number of feet.

Mr. TAGGART. It is capable of retaining a flood in case there is one, is it not?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. It will impound flood waters.

Mr. TAGGART. And the theory is that if it is allowed to run out in the dry season, it can be used for irrigation purposes, and in case of a flood in spring it will effectually retain the flood?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Of course it conserves flood water.

Mr. TAGGART. When you get a flood in the arid region, it is usually a serious flood, is it not?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. They have been the most destructive of any in many instances.

Mr. Chairman, the necessity for this legislation is mutual to the water users and the United States. That has been accurately ascertained and determined by the proper officials. The comptroller of the Reclamation Service, Mr. Ryan, was delegated by the Secretary of the Interior to come before the Committee on Irrigation and give his testimony, which expressly represents the views of the Secretary of the Interior, as well as the comptroller himself.

I shall read briefly from his testimony:

Mr. KINKAID. I should like some information on the North Platte project.

Mr. RYAN. I have a statement here which shows the number of payments—the number of water users and the number of payments they have made on each of the projects, showing those who have made payments, and how much they have made. Then here is a statement for each year since the projects were opened. The North Platte project, for instance, the total amount of building accruals is $566,940, and the total amount paid is $162,000, and the total amount unpaid is $404,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, what is the reason for that default, if you know, Mr. Ryan?

Mr. RYAN. They have been unable to make the payments; they have been unable to make the land produce sufficient to make the payments.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it your judgment, Mr. Ryan, that, without an extension of time, these water users on that project you just mentioned, for instance, would be able to meet their payments within 10 years?

Mr. RYAN. They would not. I think it problematical on the North Platte whether a sufficient extension of time is made under the provisions of this bill. I have doubts about it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it probable, Mr. Ryan, that the money for these construction charges could be returned more certainly in 20 years than in 10? That is not the question either that I intended to ask. Don't you think that we can get the money back more quickly by extending the time than by letting it remain as it is?

Mr. RYAN. Yes, sir; absolutely. The 20-year extension is necessary as a business measure in order to get the money back into the reclamation fund. I doubt if you would get it back under the terms of the old bill, but I feel certain that you will get it back under the terms of the new bill.

EXPLAINS WHY.

The example of the discouraged and disheartened settler, unable to succeed on the land he operates will deter new settlers from going on the unoccupied lands. Unless water-right applications are made for large areas not now under contract there will be a large deficit in the repayments to the reclamation fund. In order to secure thrifty and industrious settlers upon all of these lands, it is necessary to make our terms liberal enough to induce them to put their time and their labor against our investment. If we make our present settlers prosperous and contented, we will have no need to fear but that we shall have an abundance of applicants for lands not now in use.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed 25 minutes.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman 15 minutes additional time.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. I have read this statement of Mr. Ryan to show the mutuality of the public with the private water user, as to the development of further projects. Unless these settlers who are already on existing projects get relief, there will be no newcomers and no new takers of the new projects. Unless water-right applications are made for large areas not now under cultivation, there will be a large deficit in the repayments of the reclamation fund. Instead of putting off the day of the payment, this bill, duly enacted, will facilitate and accelerate the payment of funds, because of the increased number of entrymen coming on and taking these lands. The more lands taken, the more entrymen there will be to help make water-right payments. Let me repeat for emphasis that I asked Comptroller Ryan this question: "You regard it as a mutual proposition between the Government and water users that this relief be afforded—that it is in the interest of both?" To which Mr. Ryan replied, "Yes, sir."

Mr. Chairman, this makes it plain it is a mutual proposition between the Government and water users in order to get the money back to the Government and that the water user may have time to make the money. Mr. Chairman, this is a question of internal improvement. It is not a question of money loaning. It is not a question of investment, considered from the business man's standpoint. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], able and useful Congressman that he is, is also a successful business man, and he is able to perceive at once that this is not an interest-paying proposition to the Government. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] joins with his colleague from Illinois [Mr. MANN] in his proposal that interest should be paid by water users on the time given for water-right payments. This is not to be viewed as a commercial proposition for investment by the Government. It is a broader question, looking to the future of this country, a great country with a great population and a great people, and we can never be a great people without the material prosperity of the individual.

Some little criticism has been made of the bill, because it allows four years without making any payment, after making the initial payment. This is done for the purpose of enabling the homesteader to get a start, to subdue the soil. The mistake was made in the first place by assuming that water users could make their payments in 10 years. It takes 4 or 5 years to subdue the land. As pointed out by the able reclamation official of Victoria, Australia, at this Denver convention last spring, it was a great mistake not to allow the water user time and sufficient latitude in which to get a start, and that has been the great stumblingblock in our reclamation law. Other countries provide for this. Australia provides for this, New Zealand provides for it, and Argentina is going to provide for it. Are we to be behind these new countries? Are we to pursue a policy that will encourage emigration out of our country into these foreign countries?

Mr. Chairman, I desire to here emphasize as strongly as I can that water users are entitled to 10 years additional time as an equitable right, and they have a strong case at that in equity for such relief. They are entitled to it as a matter of equitable right and equitable relief without having to pay for it a consideration in the form of interest. They are entitled to it as a matter of justice, and they should not be required to buy justice.

Mr. Chairman, they are entitled to it, first, for the reason given by the Secretary—that a mistake was made in the first instance, when 20 years time should have been allowed instead of 10 years in which to make water-right payments. The mistake occurred by reason of an erroneous estimate in the time reasonably required. Who should be responsible for this erroneous estimate? Mr. Chairman, I submit it is not tenable to invoke here or apply the rules of a sharp bargain or of beware and take care of yourself at your own peril when entering into a contract. The application of no such a rule to this condition would become an enlightened people and an enlightened Government. But let me here invoke the Golden Rule. Mr. Chairman, the Government has already required water users to make good for the mistakes made in estimates as to the cost of construction, notwithstanding their bargain with the Government under the law that the first estimates made, which turned out to be too low, was what water users and the Government were both bound by.

In many instances the first estimates made of the cost of construction and what it would cost the water user per acre for his water right were found to be entirely too low, and the construction charges had to be increased. Department officials viewed it that water users were morally required to pay the actual cost of construction, and water users acceeded to the proposition. Such being the case, the Government is now bound by the same rule; it should do as it has required itself to be done by by water users, which means that it should correct the mistake made in the first instance, and that without exacting interest therefor.

Mr. Chairman, I regard it as very pertinent to right here read an excerpt from a letter written me by the Comptroller of the Reclamation Service, Mr. Ryan, in reply to a letter I wrote him about this bill. It reads:

There is one point to which I desire to particularly call your attention, and that is that the people of the various projects were attracted there by the promise contained in the reclamation law that they should have their water-right charges without interest, and that the Government is therefore under a moral obligation not to assess interest against these people now on the projects.

Mr. Chairman, this expression represents the well-settled convictions of the Secretary of the Interior and the reclamation officials who have had the greatest amount of experience with the operation of the act.

The relief should be cheerfully and immediately granted, and without price.

A second reason why the time should be extended is the greatly increased subsequent estimates of the cost of construction. It is very plain that the more the water user has to pay the longer time it will require him to make it out of the land—and water users are not capitalists, to start with—and the very theory of the reclamation act is that he be given time to make the cost of his permanent water right out of the land.

Mr. Chairman, another cogent and unanswerable reason, as I conceive it to be, why water users should be accorded 10 years extension of time, and without interest, is the necessity involved in the problem. It is necessary that he have not only the time, but also that it be accorded to him without price, because the proposition would not be a feasible one upon an interest-paying basis. To illustrate, we will all agree that there is no legitimate business that can be successfully conducted upon borrowed capital with interest paid at 50 per cent per annum. I mention an absurdly high rate to emphasize that every business has its limits of the cost of operation which may permit of its being successful. I think it will also be granted that some kinds of legitimate business can not be conducted upon borrowed capital and pay interest at even 6 per cent per annum.

Mr. Chairman, there are some branches of business, some enterprises, which would be very helpful in a public way which can never be put upon their feet, never get a start, upon borrowed money at any rate of interest. The question of the feasibility of the payment of interest by water users was determined when the reclamation act was passed. It was then determined that it was not feasible for the water user besides paying the cost of construction to pay interest for the time given him in which to make payment. It was conclusive that this would not be feasible after irrigation capitalists and investors had possessed themselves or secured control of all of the feasible projects, by which I mean such as would pay dividends or interest upon the cost of development. Private investors had left remaining only what could be reclaimed at very great cost, or far greater cost than private parties would ever risk, but large areas of the best of the semiarid lands yet remained unappropriated by private interests. Mr. Chairman, this remaining semiarid area—I mean its development—presented a problem for our Government to solve. It was to be solved in the interest of the public. The reclamation act does not contemplate immediate pecuniary gain by the Government. It does contemplate abundant returns in a public way when development shall have been accomplished.

Mr. POST. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. POST. I did not quite catch the force of the gentleman's argument as to why the Government should not ultimately recover interest on its original investment.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Because this land and project will not stand it. The proposition will not stand the payment of interest and allow the water users to live. They can not make a success of it and pay interest. That is the only reason the Government ever undertook the reclamation of arid lands by use of public-land moneys.

Mr. POST. Would not that lead to the conclusion that the project was a failure?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. No; not in the broader view of the question. Of course, from a money loaning or private capital investment standpoint, I grant you would be right. But we are pursuing a broad public policy for agriculture and home building.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If the gentleman from Nebraska will allow me, I want to suggest that there is a large percentage of land now owned by the Government in the public domain under the reclamation projects. It is open to you or me or anybody, but there will not anybody go there if they have got to pay $100 an acre for it, and pay $100 an acre more in grubbing sagebrush, oak brush, and rock, leveling the land and building ditches, and then try to grow a crop of alfalfa to produce something to sustain the family, and pay annual maintenance charges besides, and then pay interest. In other words, Uncle Sam has got the land, it is on his hands, and if he wants to get his money back he will have to offer terms that will interest settlers.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. I will state, in addition to what the gentleman from Colorado has so well said, that the returns can not come soon. It is a long-time investment which will bring great returns to the public in the end in population and wealth. We might as well dismiss the question of continuing the operation of the reclamation law if we are going to calculate that it must be put on a paying basis at the start.

Mr. POST. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. POST. I understood the argument a while ago as to why the Government should not recover ultimately was because the construction had doubled what the original estimate was. It is a good deal like the fellow who wants to borrow $1,000 from the bank and afterwards finds that he requires $2,000, and the conclusion would be that the banker ought not to charge any interest at all.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. I perceive the difficulty with the gentleman. He is reasoning from a banker's standpoint, from the investment standpoint. This is not a proposition of that kind. This is a home-building proposition. The Government started out on this with the high purpose of making these desert areas productive.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. I am pleased to yield.

Mr. HARDY. Is not the cash value of a debt due in 20 years less than 50 per cent of the face of the debt?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. You and I learned something of that kind in our mental and practical arithmetics when we were in school.

Mr. HARDY. If that be so and the Government spends $100 and requires it to be paid back in 20 years, is not that equivalent to requiring only 50 per cent of the investment?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. The gentleman from Texas is good at figures, and he can figure if he shall choose. The fallacy is in judging this grand policy of internal improvement from a private investment standpoint. It ought not to be considered in that way.

Mr. TAGGART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Yes; I shall be pleased to yield.

Mr. TAGGART. As compared with what the Government might lose in the way of interest on the money invested in reclamation, how would it compare with the vast domain that the Government absolutely gave away under the homestead act without money and without price? If the value of the land that was given away in your State and in mine within the last 50 years is estimated now, I ask how many billions, not millions, of dollars would it be worth at this time?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. I agree with the gentleman from Kansas in the statement he has made, and will add we have given away more than ten times the area of land contained in the semiarid region to the great railways. We also loaned and subsidized them in money and the issue of bonds.

Mr. Chairman, the debate has already developed the issue whether river and harbor expenditures constitute a fair criterion for our contention that no interest should be paid by water users. I shall not extend this argument upon the line thus far conducted; it is a very simple proposition, and what is in it can be seen at a glance. I am frank to say before the debate commenced I had expected to instance that river and harbor appropriations for the last 12 years aggregated $372,000,000, I believe it is, which is just about the cost of the Panama Canal. I had intended to point out how much more bountiful the returns would be to the public for the investments made in arid lands than from river and harbor expenditures, which I grant must be made, the question being the amount of the expenditures. Mr. Chairman, I shall not extend the argument upon this issue, but I do deem it logically and legitimately in point to cite that of the river and harbor appropriations a considerable percentage of it has been used and is being devoted to the construction of levees, not for the purpose of navigation, but for the sole purpose of preventing overflow of rich bottom lands tributary to the rivers.

The percentage expended in this way is for the direct purpose of the reclamation from overflow and swamp, not of the public domain but of lands privately owned. Not one dollar of even the principal is required to be repaid, thus leaving no basis for interest payment. Mr. Chairman, paradoxical as it may seem, it would appear that the reason why water users should pay interest is only because they have agreed to pay back the principal moneys invested. Mr. Chairman, providing as we are so extensively for water transportation by the construction of the Panama Canal and by river and harbor appropriations, and as the Congress has already appropriated for the improvement of public roads through the country, it seems to me that we have thereby created just about a necessity for increasing our resources of agricultural production in order to give both symmetry and consistency to our development by policies of internal improvement. It is very plain that the homes and productive farms which the reclamation of arid lands will bring about must constitute the principal foundation for the development of the semiarid regions; not only this, but a large part of the foundation for productions and business to justify the expenditures we are making to increase transportation and lessen its cost.

Mr. Chairman, if given ample time, these irrigated farms will become not only very productive but very profitable, and the communities where they are will be made prosperous. I can see the day not very far distant when these farmers, or the communities which they have built up, will be paying back returns to the Government in the form of income tax, besides the good which will be distributed generally.

Mr. Chairman, James Tyson, born in Australia, was one of the first to perceive, also to realize, handsomely upon the possibilities in irrigation. Asked what his pursuit had been, he said:

Fighting the desert. I have been fighting the desert all my life, and I have won. I have put water where there was no water; beef where there was no beef; I have put fences where there were no fences, and roads where there were no roads. Nothing can undo what I have done, and millions will be happier for it after I have been long dead and forgotten.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. I ask but half a minute.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman half a minute more.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, these irrigation farmers, with their families, constitute a grand army that has been fighting the battle for greater opportunities—greater opportunities for agriculture, greater opportunities for home building. Where the Government has put water, they have brought the plow, the reaper, and the thrasher. From the seed they have sown they are reaping rich harvests of golden grains; they have increased the supply of bread and meat for the millions that are here and will provide more for the millions that are coming. They have painted the brown and bare lands green with luxuriant alfalfa; they have diversified agriculture by the cultivation of the sugar beet and built million-dollar factories to manufacture their saccharine into sugar; they have brought agricultural form, order, method, prosperity, and landscape beauty out of the unproductive commons, resulting in populous communities with flourishing towns outnumbering the isolated ranches which theretofore constituted the population. The conquest they have been waging for the reclamation of the semiarid West has already been more than half won. In a few years their victory will be complete, if they shall not be encumbered by the payment of interest.

Mr. Chairman, our country leads the world in the republican form of its Government, and this has done much in a political way for its citizenship; but if we are to cope with the newer countries in agriculture and home building, we must lessen rather than add to the burden of the faithful and loyal home builders of the semiarid West. [Hearty applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has again expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I have not studied this bill from a scientific standpoint sufficiently to have really made up my mind as to what is best to be done with it. The one thing that I have done is to go into the measure in a general way, and I have reached the conclusion long ago that farming is of such high importance to the American people that no man, either in or out of a legislative body, can afford to do anything to discourage it. Farming stands out among the other businesses of the world like Pike's Peak does among the foothills of the Rockies. On it the Nation depends for its success. From its yield this year we expect to add more than $10,000,000,000 of wealth to our resources. On it all other occupations of the world rest, and without it none of them can survive. For that reason, no man can afford to do anything which would in any way discourage agriculture.

It is plain and must be conceded by everybody that there is in the West a mighty empire, a rainless region, which when irrigated is as fertile as the valley of the Nile or the Mississippi, a region which produces a greater quantity per acre than any other soil in America. I was in Salt Lake City on the fiftieth anniversary of the settlement of that great city, and I found irrigated arid land in that basin producing 100 bushels of wheat to the acre, while down in Illinois where we claim to be the cream of productiveness, we were troubled to get a yield of from 20 to 30 bushels per acre. With the great opportunities in the West, with that vast empire before us, our duty is plain; we can not afford to say that it is an individual project, because it is not. It is like opening up a great river for navigation. It is like building the Alaskan railway to get the coal and other products out of Alaska. It is like digging the Panama Canal to hasten and cheapen the commerce of the world. It is of such high importance that it rises far above an individual proposition and becomes national in character.

The question confronting us is whether we will allow that great productive area to lie dormant, as it has for all ages in the past, or whether we will in our wisdom take hold of it in a businesslike way and provide the people of the West with the proper means of irrigation, so that we can reclaim that vast arid region. There is plenty of water there, I understand, plenty of water to be reached for the purpose of irrigating all of that property, and it ought to be done. We talk of economy—and I am a calamity howler on that subject—but when I see my country giving away 200,000,000 acres of land to corporations, when I see my country giving away vast sums, like a nation's gold, to the same corporations to build transcontinental railways, then I say that a proposition to reclaim the arid lands of the West is so overshadowing in its importance to America that the money required for this purpose is small, indeed, when compared with what we have given away to corporations.

I know that whatever sum may be appropriated here will be a tax on the people. The expense of Government naturally is always a burden. We can not escape it. These burdens sometimes fall more heavily upon one section of the country than another; but whatever may be said, the greatest wisdom that can be brought together here in this body ought to be exercised in order to reclaim this priceless territory.

It may be best to amend the bill in some parts so that the Government will receive a small rate of interest on what is advanced, but it is far more generous to aid the poor homeseekers without exacting usury than it is to give both principal and interest to rich corporations.

Mr. POST. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; if I can get a little more time.

Mr. RAKER. Well, there are a number of gentlemen who have yet to be heard.

Mr. FOWLER. My time is not yet up and I will yield to the gentleman, but I may want a little more time.

Mr. POST. Section 13 speaks of the farm unit. What is the farm unit under this reclamation project?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I will answer that by saying that it is a tract of land sufficient to support a man's family and his wife.

Mr. POST. No definite area?

Mr. RAKER. No definite area. It runs from 20 acres up to 150 acres.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I suppose the able gentleman from California has given the proper definition. I understand that a farm unit is the allotment made to the individual family, whatever it may be. That has always been my understanding of the term. I say whatever may be appropriated here, whether it is loaned by the Government with interest or without interest, it will be a tax upon the people. I have placed my ideas of taxation in a few crude verses, which I desire to recite:

TAXATION SHOULD BEGIN WHERE THE SURPLUS SETS IN.

The taxing power of Government
From the consent of the people flows,
With no right to raise another cent
B'yond what the need of revenue shows.
Its burdens on the people are laid
To encourage the progress of man,
Without which no effort would be made
To endure such a burdensome plan.

To use this power for private gain
Is an invasion of human rights.
More wicked than to plunder the slain
On battlefields after bloody fights.
An equal chance in the race of life
For happiness and prosperity
Should be maintained in all tax-rate strife
And handed down to posterity.

Enough to satisfy man's daily wants
Is demanded by nature's decree.
And should not suffer from hasty jaunts
Of tax collectors, but should be free.
Where shall the taxing power begin
On its mission to raise revenues?
Yonder, just where the surplus sets in,
That's the place to start tax-levy crews.

Begin where no cries are heard for bread;
Begin when the heart ceases to ache,
Because the poor have been clothed and fed;
Begin where want and woe never spake.
Mark well the spot where poverty ends,
And, begin not, till plenty is sure,
For God, to the world, this message sends,
"Rob not the poor because he is poor."

Locate the dividing line between
Toil and treasure and pain and pleasure;
On one side of this line may be seen
Pride and plenty and lust and leisure,
Controlling the policies of state,
While on the other, trouble and tears,
Wail and want, doubt and despair, debate
Grave problems of state for coming years.

Look! Spread out o'er this magic domain,
Wealth, a hundred thirty billions lie,
Piled, like the ir'n ore in fair Loraine,
In heaps, while from hunger millions die.
Here begin, but with caution proceed,
Taxing large fortunes most steadily,
So that hereafter there'll be no need
To tax breadwinners so readily.

[Applause.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask unanimous consent that those who so desire may have five days in which to extend their remarks in the RECORD upon this bill.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like for the gentleman to confine it to those who have spoken on this bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The reason I put it in that shape was that there are a great many who desire to speak and who can not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that those who have spoken upon the bill——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; I did not say those who have spoken.

Mr. FOSTER. I suggest that has to be done in the House. The committee has no power to authorize that.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I withdraw the request; and I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. STOUT].

Mr. STOUT. Mr. Chairman, anyone who has made even a slight study of the conditions which obtain on the 28 Government reclamation projects which have been begun since the passage of the Newlands Act 12 years ago must realize the absolute necessity of remedial legislation, such as proposed in this bill. One of the most beneficent enterprises ever undertaken by this Government, the reclaiming of millions of acres of unused and useless land for the benefit of our people, will fall far short of its splendid purpose if the measure now under consideration fails to pass this House. My personal knowledge of conditions under which thousands of settlers in the State of which I have the honor to be one of the Representatives at Large in this body are struggling has induced me to presume upon the time and patience of the House at this time. As a matter of fact, I possess no particular aptitude for speech making. When I was making my campaign for Congress I promised the good people of Montana that I would not make any speeches if they sent me down here. [Applause.] Those who were fortunate enough to hear my preelection oratorical efforts generally agreed that perhaps it would be just as well if I adhered to that announced determination. Thus far I have religiously observed the promise so solemnly made and so enthusiastically received by my constituents. I have sat here for 15 months and heard about 15,000 speeches. There have been moments when temptation has beset me, but impulse has always yielded to the saner judgment of a second thought, and the voluminous RECORD of two trying sessions has remained unadorned by any extended outbursts from this source. Upon reflection, I may add that the RECORD has not suffered particularly by reason of my self-abnegation. Despite my failure to illumine its pages with occasional discursions into "the state of the Union," the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD has managed to hold its own with an appreciative clientele as the source of considerable wisdom, the very fountain of wit, and the convenient vehicle for the dissemination of enlightenment. [Laughter.] Taken in conjunction with the blessed, though sadly overworked, franking privilege, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD serves as the bulwark of our sacred institutions by aiding and abetting the lofty aspirations of the Nation's elect. [Applause.]

The only earthly excuse I have to offer for breaking my pledged word to my people, violating a solemn covenant with myself, and interjecting these halting remarks into the proceedings of this day is the profound interest which my constituency has in the measure now before the House for consideration. The success and happiness of thousands of the best people in Montana, which is equivalent to saying the best people on God's footstool, depend upon the passage of this bill. Its enactment into law means for them that hopefulness and good cheer which a future, filled with promise, carries into the hearts of all who toil for better things. Its failure would be the capsheaf of their misfortune, the consummation of years of hopelessness and sturdy sacrifice.

When the reclamation act was passed in 1902 Montana presented greater opportunities for successful operation under the new law than did any other State in the Union. There were millions of acres of as fine soil as can be found in all outdoors, and possessing, in almost limitless quantities and correct proportion, the elements required for the bountiful production of grain and grasses and vegetables. Agricultural science had not yet perfected the marvelous system of dry farming and these vast level bench lands were lying idle and unproductive solely because the rain did not fall in sufficient abundance to inspire the thousands of hungry land seekers with the confidence required to attempt the work of reclamation. Across these plains flowed mighty rivers, fed by the eternal snow on the distant mountain tops, and this combination of unused soil and wasting waters appealed to the men who were placed in charge of the reclamation work as the ideal situation for beginning the task intrusted to their hands. As a further justification for giving Montana the preference it was found that that State was by far the heaviest contributor to the reclamation fund, accumulated by the sale of public lands.

Seven great projects with a total area of 954,924 acres have been started in Montana. Two of these have been practically completed and substantial units of the others made ready for the settler. When all of the projects have been finished they will afford homes for twenty-five or thirty thousand people and will produce annually millions of dollars worth of grain, hay, vegetables, and live stock.

SOME MISTAKES MADE.

In outlining work of the extent of that accomplished by the Reclamation Service, it is impossible to avoid making some mistakes. In view of its magnitude, this was practically a new field of operation and one involving greater engineering feats than had ever before been attempted in that particular line of endeavor. In the beginning estimates were made by the Government engineers of the ultimate cost per acre which the settler, who was to reimburse the Government for its expenditure, would have to pay. It was upon the basis of these estimates that thousands of settlers entered upon these lands and established their homes. They had implicit faith in the Government making good its promises, and so made provisions to take care of their yearly payments. But as the work advanced a number of unexpected situations arose which vastly increased the cost of construction. It was found advisable for the Government to build more lateral ditches than the original plan contemplated, to erect bigger dams and wider and deeper canals. Difficulties in engineering, which could not have been reasonably foreseen, were encountered. But the chief element of increased cost over the first estimates was the great advance in the cost of labor and supplies. I am willing to admit that no one was particularly to blame for these unfortunate conditions, but the fact remains that the burden fell on the settler.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STOUT. I will.

Mr. MOORE. I sympathize as thoroughly as the gentleman does with the men who went on these lands, but I would like to know just what sort of an understanding they had when they entered? Were representations as to the per acre cost made by the Government or its officials, or were they made by individuals?

Mr. STOUT. As I understand it, I am glad the gentleman from Pennsylvania asked the question, many representations were made by representatives of the Government.

Mr. MOORE. In circulars and in literature?

Mr. STOUT. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman has conversed with a great many of these people, I assume?

Mr. STOUT. I have seen a good many.

Mr. MOORE. Can the gentleman tell us whether they did go in good faith, believing they could accomplish what they sought to do on the terms and the prices indicated?

Mr. STOUT. I can reply to the gentleman that those with whom I talked went in thinking they could fulfill their obligations to the Government.

Mr. MOORE. In the Eastern States we have large areas of land that could be purchased with improvements, all ready for tilling, at prices less than the cost of the construction we have heard about to-day, which gives rise to the inquiry as to why men should have gone into arid territory and taken these chances.

Mr. STOUT. In order to make an adequate explanation in reply to the gentleman's question——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Montana has expired.

Mr. MOORE. Ask for more time.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, we have a call for about two hours' more time right now.

Mr. MOORE. I will say to the gentleman from Colorado that I interrupted the gentleman from Montana in the midst of his address, and therefore would like to see him have more time.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. We have agreed to adjourn at 5 o'clock.

Mr. STOUT. Give me just a moment.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. All right.

Mr. STOUT. I was just going to answer the gentleman's question as to why there are idle lands in the cities back East and the people are going out to the West. In order to do so I would have to make some invidious comparisons between the climate of the West and the climate of the East. Such comparisons might possibly prejudice some of my friends from the East, and therefore I prefer not to answer his question. [Applause.]

Mr. BRYAN. Would the gentleman allow me to suggest that if the people of the reclamation districts asked and got as much protection as the people of the State of Pennsylvania they would certainly bankrupt the country.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman from Washington does not know what he is talking about. Comparatively Pennsylvania gets as little out of the Congress as any State in the Union.

Mr. STOUT. He found that instead of being obligated to pay $25 or $30 per acre for his water right, he would be compelled in some instances to pay twice that amount and more. Instead of having to pay $2.50 to $3 per acre per year, he discovered that he would have to pay $5 or $6 per acre, not counting the maintenance charge of approximately $1 per acre annually.

It is safe to say that a very large percentage of the settlers on these reclamation projects throughout the West are people of moderate means. Most of them are men with families who seized upon this opportunity to secure some land, build homes, and provide the means with which to educate their children. I have personally met scores of them and can say to you that as a class they are hard working, frugal, patriotic American citizens. On some of the projects in my own State they have been struggling along for several years, facing the discouragements which always fall to the lot of the pioneer with an unwavering faith that their Government would awaken to the disadvantageous conditions under which they have been compelled to exist and render the relief which is so absolutely necessary if they are to succeed in their efforts to build and enjoy homes on those western plains. They are the blood and sinew of the highest type of American citizenship, and ask no odds of Uncle Sam except that he shall grant such conditions as will enable them to discharge their obligations to the National Government without the abatement of a single copper. [Applause.]

I would invite the attention of the House to the difficulties which a new settler on a reclamation project has to face. Assume that he has some means, a thousand or two thousand dollars. Many of them, of course, have much less. He has to build a house, and even the construction of the most modest dwelling eats deeply into his resources. Then there are barns and other outbuildings to be erected. A team of horses must be purchased, and also farming implements, cows, hogs, and chickens. He has to break the sod, a laborious task even with the best of equipment, and frequently level a portion of his claim. He must construct small lateral ditches in order to distribute the water over his farm and then fence the place. Before he has finished these necessary improvements, in all too many cases, his little hoard of savings is wiped out.

It is impossible to get more than a few acres into cultivation the first year, and if the product from this small tract so cultivated is sufficient to provide feed for his few head of stock and vegetables for his table, the settler counts himself fortunate. Certainly there will be no surplus to sell for the money required to purchase clothing for his family and school books for his children. In many instances he is so far from market that any surplus which he might have can not be disposed of at a profit. If the settler comes from some other State, as many of them naturally do, he has to contend with unknown conditions of soil and climate. He has little credit, and if he does happen to possess some collateral upon which to negotiate a loan, the interest rate is high.

Manifestly the settler should be given a few years in which to build his house and other buildings, to get his raw land under cultivation, and to stock up his place, before being placed under the necessity of beginning to pay his water charges. It is equally important that his payments should be as light as possible when he first begins to make them. This bill gives him relief in these two all-essential particulars. It also possesses provisions for more amply safeguarding the great interest which the Government has in the projects and simplifies the administration of the affairs of these giant undertakings. It makes infinitely more secure the Government's investment by making it easier for the settler to return to the reclamation fund the money assessed against him for his water right.

I do not presume that anyone will seriously attempt to controvert the far-reaching importance of the work undertaken by the National Government in reclaiming vast portions of the arid and semiarid States of the western part of this country. At no time in the world's history has there been such a demand for land by the landless as at the present time. "Back to the soil" is a slogan born of the hopes which have welled up in the hearts of millions to possess some of God's domain and to work out their own destinies beneath their own vine and fig tree.

Every thoughtful student of social economy recognizes the necessity of stemming the tide of immigration to the crowded tenements of the great cities and turning it toward the open country to aid in the production of the things upon which not only the prosperity but the very existence of the cities depends. This land hunger has within the last two decades doubled, trebled, and even quadrupled the price of land in the great agricultural States of the eastern, southern, and central regions of our country. The time has passed when a man of moderate means can go into those regions and acquire sufficient land upon which to earn a livelihood and lay aside a competence for his declining years. He must push on out toward the frontier, on to the Great Plains and into the shadows of the western mountains.

The Government can engage in no greater enterprise than that of encouraging its people to go out there into that great western country, tame the soil, conquer the elements, and attain that independence which is at once the glory of the Republic and the hope of its future existence. Every handicap should be removed, every protection thrown about them while they are engaged in the supreme task of building homes and reclaiming a veritable empire for the benefit of generations to come. Each and every one of them should be made to feel that their Government is in sympathy with their efforts, that it is standing behind them, wishing them success, understanding their needs, and willing to extend a helping hand to aid them in any extremity.

I ask for the settlers on those reclamation projects merely that they may be given a fair show to work out the problems which confront them. Free them from the red tape which so often entangles them, to the impediment of their progress, remove restrictive conditions, open up the way for their advancement by granting them terms possible of fulfillment, and the future for them will be assured. They are not mendicants, appealing to you for special favors, but thrifty, hard-working, self-reliant American citizens, who ask only that which every westener considers eternally sufficient—just an even break. This bill gives them that and nothing more. Enact it into law and within the lifetime of many Members of this House every project now in course of construction will have been completed, every cent of the money invested in them will have been returned to the Government, to be reinvested in other enterprises of even greater magnitude. Our Government can devote its vast resources to no more worthy work than that of providing land for the landless, homes for the homeless, and hope for the hopeless. Such, I submit, Mr. Chairman, are the purposes of the bill now before the House for its consideration. [Applause.]

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. STOUT, Mr. FOWLER, and Mr. JOHNSON of Washington by unanimous consent were granted leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield until I can ask a question of the gentleman from Colorado? Is it the purpose of the committee to close general debate on this bill to-day?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. We were in hopes to close debate at 5 o'clock. I have been liberal with everybody. They have consumed three times more on the other side of the aisle than we have. I propose to close debate and adjourn at 5 o'clock, and we have promised everybody to be as liberal as possible under the five-minute rule. I even promised one gentleman 30 minutes under the five-minute rule if he would not talk now.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman from Colorado permit a question? When are those in opposition to the bill going to be heard?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. We are ready to hear them at any time. There is not a soul in this House who has asked me to speak against this bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will say to the gentleman that I was not on the floor when the agreement was made, but since I have been here the debate has been alternating between those who are in favor of the bill.

Mr. MOORE. I want to say to the gentleman from Colorado that we have been tolerant in this matter. Those who have had questions to ask have done so without asking for time. There might be opposition to this bill. There are some gentlemen who have been somewhat pert in their answers.

Mr. DONOVAN. Regular order, Mr. Chairman. The gentleman from Idaho is losing his time.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. So far as I am concerned, and so far as the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID] is concerned, we will give you all the time that is needed.

Mr. MOORE. It is fair for us to know——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. What do you want?

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman can not say whether the opposition had any time.

Mr. DONOVAN. The gentleman is out of order. Time is being used up here.

Mr. MOORE. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE. Is the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] the only gentleman in order at all times?

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry. The gentleman from Idaho will proceed.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] is clearly out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not state whether the gentleman from California is out of order or not until he states his question.

Mr. DONOVAN. He can only make a point of order. The gentleman from Idaho is entitled to the floor. The gentleman from California has no right to interject remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho [Mr. SMITH] is recognized.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, if you should purchase a horse for $100 and were unable to meet the payments as they became due and the seller should advise you that in order to get an extension of time you would be expected to pay $300 for the horse and interest on the deferred payments, you would feel that you were not getting a square deal. Yet a transaction of this character represents exactly the situation which confronts the settlers on a great majority of the Government irrigation projects.

The building of the great dams, storage reservoirs, and canals was a work that was entirely new to the engineers of the country, and those employed by the Government to estimate the cost were greatly mistaken in their calculations. In every instance the cost of construction was greatly in excess of the estimates, and in some instances was two and three times the original estimates. These settlers, in entering the land, were naturally under the impression that the first estimates were correct and that the water would cost them in some instances as low as $15, when subsequent developments have shown that it will cost them three and four times as much.

The enactment of the reclamation law in 1902 was hailed with delight by thousands of people who desired a home in the arid States, as well as by the Senators and Representatives from those States, and the economists and philanthropists who recognized the great possibilities of turning hundreds of thousands of acres of worthless lands into productive farms and the establishment of cities and towns, the construction of railroads, and other evidences of progress in a country which for centuries had been nothing but a desert. As quickly as possible after the enactment of this law the Secretary of the Interior, to whom the administration of the law was committed, had the necessary surveys made and the boundaries of the various projects were established. This land was withdrawn from entry under the general land laws and made available only to those who desired to enter under the reclamation law. Notwithstanding that none of these projects could be completed within three to five or more years the land was opened to entry and the people invited to select the land they desired and make entry at the local land offices. Residence was required in order to confirm the right to the land, notwithstanding the fact that there was no water available for even domestic purposes.

Thousands of home seekers flocked upon these various projects, some of them without money and probably only a team of horses, others with several thousand dollars. They established themselves upon the land in such houses and shacks as they could erect, and settled down to wait patiently for the delivery of the water. As heretofore stated, they were required to continue residence upon the land or subject their entries to contest by other prospective settlers who were anxious to get a homestead. The hardships and sufferings of these people living upon the desert, in many instances 10 or more miles from the post office, and being required to haul water a great distance for domestic purposes and to water such stock as they had upon the place, can not be portrayed in words. Only those who have endured them can convey any impression of the agony which they experienced. In nearly every instance those who went there with money consumed it all in maintaining themselves, and after two or three years found themselves reduced to poverty.

Under the Black Canyon project in Idaho, a part of the Payette-Boise project, there are over 900 families who have been on the land for nearly 10 years, who are still waiting for the water to irrigate their lands, but on the Minidoka project and on a portion of the Payette-Boise project in my State water was finally furnished and the people are making every possible effort to build homes and improve their farms, and some of them are succeeding remarkably well. Many of them, having used all of their capital to maintain themselves and families before water was available, are finding themselves unable to meet their payments which have accumulated, and in some instances their claims are now subject to cancellation. The Secretary of the Interior has extended the time of payment from time to time with the hope that this bill would be enacted and the settlers would be able to save their claims. If the relief prayed for is not afforded, or if the settlers are burdened with the necessity of paying interest on the deferred payments as has been proposed, it would simply mean that many of them will be required to give up their claims, and all of their suffering and effort will go for naught and the claims will be canceled. These entries will then be open to the stranger, who will have the unearned benefit of the work done by the original entryman, except such improvements as could be removed from the land.

As heretofore stated, these settlers entered the land with the hope of making a home for themselves and families. They have complied with the law in every respect and are now confronted with the necessity of paying two or three times as much for the water as they originally expected. They are perfectly willing to meet the increased payments, but plead for an extension of time within which to earn the money to do so. The Government can not be injured by the enactment of this bill. No appropriation is asked; it is simply a plain petition from a most deserving class of citizens, who ask that the time of payment of the debt which is hanging over them may be extended, in order that they may save their homes and prevent their families from being thrust out, after having spent years in the struggle to get a home upon the public domain. [Applause.]

Much has been said here to-day in regard to the liberality of the Government with reference to those who go upon the pubilc land with a view of establishing a home. It is true that our Government has been liberal, but not so much so as many other nations throughout the world, who recognize the importance of encouraging the development of their agricultural resources.

The substantial encouragement given the farmers in other countries is well stated in an article prepared by Comptroller Ryan, of the Reclamation Service, printed in the April number of the Reclamation Record, from which I quote:

ENGLAND.

In England, by the small-holdings act of 1907, county councils are authorized to purchase or condemn large estates and subdivide them into small tracts to be sold. The purchaser pays one-fifth down and the balance is spread over a term of 50 years. The money to buy the land and subdivide is loaned by the public works land commissioners at 3½ per cent. The average cost of land acquired under this act was less than $100 per acre. The cost of preparing them for sale to small holders has averaged $10 per acre. During 1908 and 1909, 60,889 acres were acquired under the act. Of this area 34,234 acres were sold in small holdings and 26,655 acres were leased.

IRELAND.

The estates commission and the congested districts board are commissions nominated by the Government, and have for their object the division and sale of estates. The procedure is as follows: A large estate is put up for sale and appraised. If the price asked by the owner is satisfactory, the estate is purchased and the owner is paid in Government land, scrip, or stock bearing 3 per cent interest. Estates sold under compulsion the Government must pay for in cash. The estate is then divided into tracts of 25 to 30 acres, line walls are built if necessary, a house is constructed at a cost of about $1,000, and the place is sold to a tenant. The land is sold to the small holders at a price not to exceed the purchase price. Frequently it is sold for less. The small holder pays 3 per cent interest at present on the purchase price and one-half per cent amortization, payable in semiannual installments. This rate amortizes the debt in about 62 years. The purchaser is given a title to the land, pays the taxes on it, and may transfer his equity at any time if he chooses.

The local authorities (county councils, etc.) may advance money for the purchase of the property which a tenant occupies to the extent of four-fifths of the purchase price, a limit of $1,600 being placed on the loan. The amount so advanced must be repaid within 30 years. Installments of such payments are of equal amounts, and may be weekly, monthly, or semiannual. The installments are inclusive of interest, the rate of which varies according to the rate at which the money is borrowed for the purpose by the local government, and the only charge for the service is 10 shillings in addition to the interest.

SCOTLAND.

The same law applies to Scotland, with only minor modifications. The small-holdings act is proving a great success in promoting intensive cultivation, dairying, stock raising, etc.

CANADA.

In Canada the provincial government of New Brunswick gives a bonus of $200 to aid in the establishment of cheese factories and creameries. It imports cattle, sheep, and pigs, and sells them at prices far below cost. It encourages by money grants the farm institutes and association of farmers.

SOUTH AUSTRALIA.

In South Australia the State assists the primary producer in many ways. It prepares, packs, exports, sells, and accounts for all kinds of produce. It slaughters and sells his animals for him. It makes and sells his butter. It packs and markets his fruits. It advances to the settler not more than $3,000 for the purpose of improving his farm. This is advanced by installments. If proper use is not made of one installment advances cease. Advances are made to discharge prior mortgages or to purchase Crown lands. Repayments extend over 30 years. Five per cent interest is charged. During the first five years the interest only is paid. Rebates are allowed for prompt payments. Loans may be secured from the State up to 60 per cent of the value of the land. These loans may be repaid in semiannual installments of less than $15 on each $500 borrowed.

NEW SOUTH WALES.

In New South Wales advances are made upon the security of freehold lands, conditional purchases, settlement leases, homestead selections, and grants. The basis of these advances is not fixed by legislation, but by regulation of the "advances to settlers' board." On freeholds advances are up to two-thirds of the unimproved value of the land plus half the official value of the improvements. On homestead selections and homestead grants advances are not to exceed one-half the value of the improvements. A maximum term of 31 years is allowed for repayment. When it is known that settlers can not meet their repayment installments because of adverse natural conditions, great clemency is exercised. The repayment installments are $5 per year on each $100 borrowed for 31 years, or a total repayment of $155 for each $100 borrowed. A system of rebates for prompt payments may reduce this amount to $140. Penalties are assessed upon delinquents. The money for this purpose is raised by the sale of guaranteed stock.

TASMANIA.

In Tasmania any man may select from 50 to 640 acres of public land. He will be given a free grant for 1 acre for each $5 worth of farming implements and improvements he places on the land if he will live on it for five years. He may if he chooses buy land to the value of $666 and pay for it in 14 years, paying $16 down, $25 the first year, $25 the second, and $50 for each of the next 12 years.

VICTORIA (AUSTRALIA).

The government of Victoria assists settlers of experience with sufficient capital to take up further land upon exceptionally easy terms. Three per cent of the value is required as a deposit and the balance of the purchase price, with interest at 4½ per cent per annum, may be spread over a period of 31½ years. The government also assists by erecting houses for the settlers and giving cheap loans to the value of 60 per cent on all improvements effected on the land. This with a view to encouraging progressive and successful settlers.

NEW ZEALAND.

In New Zealand the settler may borrow from the State not to exceed $15,000 for the improvement of his land. The amount is repaid in 73 semiannual installments of 2¾ per cent of the amount borrowed; that is to say in 36½ years at 5½ per cent per year the debt amortizes. This produces an annual profit to the government of over $25,000 on outstanding loans. A poor man may take 5 acres of land in New Zealand and the government will advance him $250 to aid him in fencing, planting, and building a home.

SICILY.

Credit is given on notes which are made payable at the time of harvesting crops, so that the farmers may get the money when they need to work the farm and may pay the note when the crop has been sold. The maximum time for which money can be borrowed from these banks is 50 years; the rate of interest 3½ per cent plus about 2 per cent for amortization.

ITALY.

The maximum length of time for which a loan is made is 35 years, repayable in a lump sum if for less than 10 years, and with amortization in case of loans made for a longer period. The rate of interest as a rule is 4 per cent, but it rises sometimes to 4½ per cent and sometimes as high as 5 per cent, according to the state of the money market. To this must be added a charge for income tax. In the case of long-term loans, made for 35 years, the regulations provide that the rate of interest may vary always remaining at one-half per cent higher than the rate of interest paid by the savings bank to its depositors.

Long-time loans are made to associations for agricultural purposes, for the purchase of live stock, and for improving breeds of live stock. The rate of interest charged is from 2 to 3½ per cent. In some special cases the bank has made mutual loans bearing no interest. Short-time loans for six months are made for the purchase of seed, the rate of interest charged being 2 per cent, and 3 per cent when the loan is for other agricultural purposes. The local banks discounting these notes are allowed to charge an extra 1 per cent on 2 per cent loans and an extra one-half per cent on 3 per cent loans, raising them to 3 and 3½ per cent. Lately the rate of interest was uniformly fixed at 2¾ per cent on condition that the local banks could charge a maximum rate of only 3½ per cent.

ROUMANIA.

Loans are made to members and to nonmembers of cooperative banks, members paying interest at the rate of 8 to 10 per cent, while nonmembers pay from 1 to 2 per cent more. Loans are to be utilized for productive purposes, and are chiefly granted upon personal security, the payment of such loans being guaranteed by the entire estate of the borrower. The duration of the loan is usually from 6 to 9 months, with right of prolongation to 18 months.

HUNGARY.

The Government aids the farmer by supplying him with seeds, saplings, and stock for breeding, requiring a fair interest on the purchase price and insuring the animals for one year. Where sufficient guaranty can be given for advances in the form of State aid, loans are granted at a low rate of interest—in some cases without interest. For the purchase of steam plows, 5 to 10 neighboring farmers come together to form a union. Having out of their own resources subscribed 50 per cent of the purchase price, they received the balance as a loan from the department of agriculture. The terms were for five years at 2 per cent interest. These were later modified, the department granting no advances, but, for five years, subscribing 5 per cent of the arrears of payment.

Mortgage bonds are issued at 4½ per cent, running 63 years, with a yearly charge, including amortization, of 4.85 per cent; also mortgage bonds at 4 per cent, running 50 years, with a yearly charge of 4.7 per cent.

The National Small Holdings Land Mortgage Institute originally made loans at the rate of 5½ per cent and for a period of 33½ years. Later the rate was 5 per cent and the period 15 years or 33½ years. Still later the rate was 4½ per cent, the period 17, 25, 40, or 50 years, and afterwards 4 per cent, with periods of 20, 30, 40, 50, 65 years. On a loan for 65 years the holders of the bonds get 5 per cent, and the debtor pays for 65 years 5.56 per cent, of which 5 per cent is interest, 0.21 per cent is amortization, and 0.35 per cent for administration and commission. For 50 years the interest is 5 per cent; amortization, 0.47 per cent; commissions, etc., 0.35 per cent, making a total of 5.82 per cent. The Government furnishes seed to the farmers at a nominal price for cash or on credit.

AUSTRIA.

The amount of mortgage may be one-half the estimated value of houses and two-thirds the value of agricultural property, in which case the amount of the mortgage will be two-thirds of twenty-five times the net earning capacity of the holding. Loans are not made in cash, but in bonds, the bonds being sold on the stock exchange and the borrower getting the proceeds of the sale. In the event of a loan being contracted at 4 per cent interest the borrower would have to repay 4½ per cent yearly, so that the full loan would be amortized in 54½ years. Every loan must be amortized within 59 years.

BOHEMIA.

Credit for the purpose of improving and purchasing land is given on the security of a mortgage on the land. Loans are based on two-thirds of the value of the land mortgaged and are repayable by amortization at the rate of 1 per cent. The rate of interest charged on loans varies from 4 to 6 per cent.

RUSSIA.

Private land-mortgage systems, Kharkoff. The longest term for which money is loaned is 66 years. In addition to the annual installments on the original loan interest must be paid at the rate of 4 per cent. Cost of administration must also be included. Sixty per cent of the valuation of the estate is the maximum amount which can be loaned.

The Peasants' Land Mortgage Bank, Kharkoff, was established by the Government to do business exclusively with the peasants. Large estates are purchased and sold in small holdings to the peasants. The general policy is to establish a period of repayment extending over 55½ years. The rate of interest charged, including amortization, cost of administration, and repayment of loan, amounts to only 4½ per cent. Any costs above this are borne by the Government. The Government loans money to the peasants, the funds for this purpose being secured by the issue of bonds. The net interest rate on these bonds frequently amounts to 5 or 6 per cent, so that the Government is losing money in the business.

In the fall the peasants need money and are willing to sell their goods at almost any price. To prevent speculation the Imperial Bank grants money to credit associations on the security of grain. The Government takes the grain, puts it into granaries, and loans money on it as security, charging from 5 to 6 per cent on the loan.

GERMANY.

On loans concerned with land cultivation the interest rate of the Royal Land Improvement Institute, of Bavaria, is one-fourth per cent lower than the rate of the agricultural bonds which are issued against the loan; that is, if the loan is granted in 3½ per cent bonds, the borrower pays only 3¼ per cent interest. The other one-fourth per cent is paid by the State.

These State favors to agricultural undertakings are granted for the reason that in many cases projects are initiated from which no income is expected, or only after many years.

The repayment rate is fixed according to the original sum lent and remains the same every year. The amount of the loan may not exceed the estimated increase in value from the agricultural undertaking projected. Neither may the loan exceed the cost of the undertaking. If individuals wish a loan, they must secure it by a first mortgage on their agricultural and forest land, and such loan can not exceed one-half the estimated value of the property.

Money is loaned by the Credit Union of Wurttemberg on first mortgage on city and country property, preference being given to country property. All loans are confined to the amortization plan on terms payable in installments of from 10 to 50 years, at the option of the borrower. On a 50-year amortization mortgage, the interest of the borrower is at the rate of 4.85 per cent—interest, 4 per cent; amortization, 0.66 per cent; advance to reserve, returnable with compound interest at the expiration of the loan, 0.19 per cent. The minimum loan is 300 marks; no maximum. The loan is made on the basis of 50 per cent of the valuation, specially determined by the local municipal authorities where the loans are to be granted.

Landholders' cooperative associations, known as Landschaft and controlled by the Prussian Government, are organized for the purpose of procuring money on mortgage. Loans are made to a borrower on 66 per cent of the value of his land. He receives bonds which pay as a rule 3½ per cent and are sold in the open market, and he pays to the Landschaft 4 per cent interest. The extra one-half per cent goes to pay running expenses and for amortization after a period of from 45 to 54 years.

The German Middle Class Bank and the German Peasant Bank are public-utility corporations. Loans are made to farmers, who pay charges amounting to 4 or 4½ per cent inclusive of one-half or 1 per cent for amortization and 3 or 3½ per cent interest, so that within 64½ or 42 years the mortgage is repaid. Loans are granted in the form of land-mortgage bonds by the Hereditary Estates Credit Society of Saxony. Repayment takes place as follows: Three per cent interest plus one-half per cent additional annual charge, 66 years; 3½ per cent interest plus one-third per cent additional charge, 71 years; 3½ per cent interest plus one-half per cent additional charge, 60½ years; 3½ per cent interest plus 1 per cent additional charge, 44 years; 3½ per cent interest plus one-third per cent additional charge, 69 years; 4 per cent interest plus one-half per cent additional charge, 56 years.

SWITZERLAND.

Canton banks are Government institutions. Loans are made upon land alone up to three-fourths of its value. Repayment is made by payment of interest at the rate of 4½ to 4¾ per cent and amortization payment of from one-half to 1 per cent interest. With a payment of one-half per cent for amortization the loan would run about 50 years.

HOLLAND.

Loans are made by the Land Mortgage Bank of Holland on 50 per cent of the assessed valuation of the land. Term of credit is from 5 to 40 years. Payment for 40 years would be at the rate of 4.5 per cent for interest, 1.05 per cent for amortization, and 0.25 per cent for expenses; total, 5.8 per cent.

DENMARK.

Credit associations loan on 60 per cent of the valuation of the property. Interest rate, 4½ per cent; amortization, 0.5 per cent; expenses, 0.15 per cent.

Small holders' Government loans are made to those who have worked at least four years for other farmers. The loan the Government grants is 90 per cent of the valuation of the land, charging 3 per cent interest for a period of 5 years, and later renewed for 5 or 10 years. The small farms established in this way must be occupied individually. The loans the Government has granted in this way amount to 25,000,000 crowns (about $7,000,000); of this amount the Government has lost practically only 10,000 crowns ($2,800).

FRANCE.

France extends short time agricultural credit. Regional banks distribute to the local banks the funds placed at the disposal of agricultural credit by the Government. The local banks loan money, generally for about one year, on personal credit, with the indorsement of some one of known respectability, at an interest rate varying from 3 to 5 per cent.

Collective long time loans are made to cooperative associations organized for the purpose of purchase, production, and distribution. Interest varies from 1½ to 2 per cent on such loans. This favorable rate of interest is always granted on the basis of the belief that the promotion of agriculture means the promotion of the national interests. Agriculture, it is contended, is more heavily burdened than other industries, and in order to fight rural depopulation and further the social interests of the nation, the welfare of the farming population must be cared for.

Long term individual credit is granted only to small agricultural holdings, the value of the loan not exceeding 8,000 francs. The maximum period for which the loan runs is 15 years, and is only allowed in the case of young farmers. The purpose is to assist the small farmers to purchase holdings and to encourage young men who have finished their military service to take up small farms. The loans are extinguishable by amortization, the rate of interest being as a rule 2 per cent. Security is generally a mortgage on the land, although other securities, such as life insurance policies or personal indorsement will be accepted. The law has been in operation two years, and over 12,000,000 francs have already been loaned.

Under the Credit Foncier, which, like the Bank of France, is subject to the legislative provisions of the French Government, a farmer may borrow money at 4½ per cent interest and 1½ per cent amortization for a period of 30 years.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Idaho has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNOLLY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD my remarks on this bill by placing in the RECORD some tables that have been prepared by the Reclamation Service showing the condition of the fund and the projects.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I object. The gentleman had general debate here, and if he had not spent his time in talking hot air he would have been able to put it all in. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut objects.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Do I understand, Mr. Chairman, that there was objection to my request to insert in the RECORD these tables?

Mr. DONOVAN. I objected.

Mr. MONDELL. I am glad to know it. It shows the gentleman's attitude on these subjects.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask if there is any gentleman in the House who desires to make a speech against this bill? I know the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] does, but I will ask if there is any other gentleman besides the gentleman from Oklahoma who desires to make a speech against this bill? There seems to be no one else who desires to address the House in opposition to the bill. I will ask the gentleman from Oklahoma whether or not we can not agree between himself and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID] and me for an extension of time to the gentleman from Oklahoma during the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule, in view of the fact that we have agreed to adjourn to-day in 15 minutes?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. I will say to the gentleman from Oklahoma that I shall be glad to cooperate in that direction.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. We shall endeavor to give the gentleman from Oklahoma an extension of time under the five-minute rule—as much time as he may desire—in order that we may close this general debate and adjourn by 5 o'clock.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I would be glad, Mr. Chairman, to expedite the consideration of the bill and the closing of general debate. I have a great regard for the gentlemen who are in charge of the bill, and I have a great deal of sympathy for those men out there on these irrigation projects who are interested and who would be benefited by the enactment of the bill. I have a peculiar view on this matter. There is a peculiar situation that applies to Oklahoma that does not apply generally to the other States, and hence I have felt that I would like to have at least half an hour in which to present some things as a matter of duty.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If the ranking Member on that side of the House and I will agree, as we offer to do, that the gentleman may have half an hour on next Wednesday, would not the use of that time be considered the gentleman's full duty to his constituents?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I will say that in view of that promise of the extension of time for half an hour at the beginning of the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule, or early in its consideration——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; as early in its consideration as possible, of course, we shall have to have the sections read——

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Yes; in view of all the circumstances I do not want to be unreasonable, and I will agree to that.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, there are several gentlemen on this side who want to be heard and who want time.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. My understanding and intention is that we will be exceptionally lenient with the time under the five-minute rule.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. ROBERTS] and the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT], also the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FALCONER] and some others are desirous of time later on, if we close general debate this afternoon.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT] has been here all day long, and I have promised him that he shall have an opportunity to address the House, and I want to see that he has an opportunity to do so.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, my State is vitally interested in this bill, and I think my State is interested in the same particular as is the State of Oklahoma. But in the interest of speedy action on this bill I shall be willing to waive my right to be heard to-day if the gentleman can assure me that I shall have an opportunity to speak later.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, just a moment, in regard to the general debate to-day: As one of the members of the committee I have given a great deal of time to this bill, whether I understand it or not; but I think I do. It has not only been considered in committee, but we have gone with it to the President, and to Cabinet officers, and to the Speaker of the House, and the minority leader, and the majority leader, and to the Committee on Rules.

Now, I have waived my opportunity this afternoon to be heard upon this bill, to the end that all other gentlemen might be heard and that we might get an early disposition and enactment of the bill and that general debate might be closed, and I will use a few minutes under the five-minute rule.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. I have an understanding with the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] in charge of the bill that these several gentlemen shall have their opportunity under the five-minute rule. I should have mentioned the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FALCONER], who has been here all the afternoon ready to speak.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. And the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. ROBERTS] also.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. I would like to have him included by all means.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. That we shall cooperate to secure them as ample time as possible under the five-minute rule. That is the best we can do. They have all stood ready to do what they could for their constituents here and for the bill.

Mr. FALCONER. I want to say that I have appreciated the situation, and in order to hasten the final vote on the bill I will certainly acquiesce in taking my time under the five-minute rule.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I concur in the remarks of my colleague [Mr. FALCONER] and take the same view.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. I yield to the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. ROBERTS].

Mr. ROBERTS of Nevada. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I am a member of the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands, and I did intend to say something this afternoon, but so much has been said that I did not feel it was right to delay so important a bill.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. I do not know that the gentleman heard the statement I made when I stated that the gentleman from Colorado would cooperate to secure as much time as possible under the five-minute rule.

Mr. ROBERTS of Nevada. I understand that. I have been present all day, and I wish to do everything I can to facilitate the passage of the bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. SMALL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bill of the following title:

H. R. 1694. An act to amend an act approved October 1, 1890, entitled "An act to set apart certain tracts of land in the State of California as forest reservations."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 6031. An act authorizing the Board of Trade of Texarkana, Ark.-Tex., to construct a bridge across Sulphur River at or near Pace's ferry, between the counties of Bowie and Cass, in the State of Texas.

PAYMENT UNDER RECLAMATION PROJECTS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN].

[Mr. BRYAN addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If there are no further remarks, I will ask the Clerk to proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person whose lands hereafter become subject to the terms and conditions of the act approved June 17, 1902, entitled "An act appropriating the receipts from the sale and disposal of public lands in certain States and Territories to the construction of irrigation works for the reclamation of arid lands," and acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto, hereafter to be referred to as the reclamation law, and any person who hereafter makes entry thereunder shall at the time of making water-right application or entry, as the case may be, pay into the reclamation fund 2 per cent of the construction charge fixed for his land as an initial installment, and shall pay the balance of said charge in 15 annual installments, the first 5 of which shall be 5 per cent of the construction charge and the remainder 7 per cent until the whole amount shall have been paid. The first of the annual installments shall become due and payable on December 1 of the fifth calendar year after the initial installment: Provided, That any water-right applicant or entryman may, if he so elects, pay the whole or any part of the construction charges owing by him within any shorter period: Provided further, That entry may be made whenever water is available and the initial payment be made when the charge per acre is established.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 2, strike out the word "two" and insert the word "five."

Page 2, line 5, after the word "shall," insert the word "each."

Page 2, line 6, after the word "remainder," insert the words "shall each."

Page 2, line 14, after the word "available," insert the words "as announced by the Secretary of the Interior."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MADDEN. I rise for the purpose of asking whether or not it is the intention to leave this paragraph open to amendment?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That is the purpose, and I want the Chair to recognize the gentleman from California [Mr. KETTNER] to ask leave to extend his remarks, and then I shall move that the committee rise.

Mr. MADDEN. It is understood, then, that when the committee takes this bill up for consideration at its next meeting this paragraph will be subject to amendment?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Amendments will be in order.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Amendments to this section will be in order at that time.

[Mr. KETTNER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, in regard to the work of the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands in preparing this bill, I ask unanimous consent to insert the following statement in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] asks unanimous consent to insert a statement in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The statement is as follows:

CONSERVATION BILLS.

This bill consists of the reclamation extension bill, from the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands; the radium bill, from the Committee on Mines and Mining; the Alaskan coal and oil bill, the water-power bill, and the general coal, oil, phosphate, and sodium bill, from the Committee on the Public Lands.

The reclamation extension bill having been placed on the Unanimous Consent Calendar, and upon the call of that calendar objection was made by Mr. MANN, the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands of the House met and discussed ways and means of bringing the bill before the House at an early date.

A subcommittee of the Committee on Irrigation, consisting of Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, Mr. HAYDEN of Arizona, Mr. STOUT of Montana, and Mr. RAKER of California, took the matter up personally with President Wilson, urging him to use his good offices in bringing about early consideration of the reclamation extension bill. These four gentlemen personally interviewed President Wilson upon this bill and also upon the other bills named. The President advised the committee that he was anxious to see the legislation named disposed of at an early date, and would do whatever he could to assist in bringing about early disposition, and that he was very desirous of having the bills disposed of at an early date. The same committee then proceeded to see Mr. HENRY, the chairman of the Committee on Rules, who advised the committee that he would lend every assistance possible to bring about their early consideration. Leader UNDERWOOD was then seen by the committee, who likewise advised the committee that they could rely upon him to assist in bringing about early consideration by the House of these bills. The committee then interviewed Speaker CLARK, who was likewise willing to assist in every way in their early consideration. In this interview with Mr. CLARK it was ascertained that Mr. RAKER was second on the call for suspension of the rules, and had been for some months, and it was then agreed that when Mr. RAKER's turn was reached that the reclamation bill should be called up and should be second on suspension of the rules. If this was in any way delayed, then the Speaker advised the subcommittee that every assistance would be given to bring about an early rule or otherwise so that these bills might be considered.

In the meantime, Dr. FOSTER, chairman of the Committee on Mines and Mining and a member of the Committee on Rules, was interviewed, and signified his willingness to assist in bringing about, by rule or otherwise, the consideration of the reclamation bill, the radium bill, and the three other bills.

During the same time Hon. SCOTT FERRIS, chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, had been giving every consideration to bring about an early disposition of the three bills reported by the Committee on Public Lands, namely the water-power bill, the Alaskan coal bill, and the general coal, oil, phosphate, and sodium bill; had seen the Secretary of the Interior, and also interviewed the President with the Secretary of the Interior in regard to early consideration. Mr. FERRIS then interviewed Messrs. HAYDEN and RAKER as to circulating a petition among the Members asking for a rule from the Committee on Rules. It was then agreed to take this course, and Chairman FERRIS drew up or prepared a petition which was then circulated among the Members of the House by the members of the Committees on Public Lands and Irrigation. A majority of the House was obtained to these petitions, and the same were presented to the Committee on Rules. Messrs. FERRIS, HAYDEN, STOUT, RAKER, and others interviewed the chairman of the Committee on Rules and the members thereof, and also some of them appeared personally before the committee at the time set for consideration of a rule upon these five bills by the committee. The Committee on Rules, after consideration, agreed to a rule that the five bills be considered, namely, the water-power bill, the Alaskan coal bill, the general coal, oil, phosphate, and sodium bill, the radium bill, and the reclamation extension bill. The chairman and members of the Committee on Public Lands of the House, as well as the chairman and members of the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands of the House, were active in interviewing the President; the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Lane; the chairman of the Rules Committee, Mr. HENRY; Speaker CLARK; and Leader UNDERWOOD to assist in bringing about every consideration and disposition of these bills, and every assistance and encouragement was given by the parties named for disposition of what is known as the conservation bills, and in particular this reclamation bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I think there was some misunderstanding as to what I desired to place in the RECORD in the extension of my remarks. The Reclamation Service prepared some tables relative to reclamation work, and I simply ask to extend those tables in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by placing in the RECORD the tables indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FLOOD of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 4628) extending the period of payment under reclamation projects, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENCAMPMENT OF KNIGHTS OF PYTHIAS, TERRE HAUTE, IND.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 304, authorizing the Secretary of War to loan certain saddles and bridles for the use of the national encampment Knights of Pythias, to be held at Terre Haute, Ind., in July, 1914.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 304.

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to loan, at his discretion, to the mount committee of the national encampment, Knights of Pythias, to be held at Terre Haute, Ind., in the month of July, 1914, 200 saddles and bridles: Provided, That no expense shall be caused the United States Government by the delivery and return of said property, the same to be delivered to said committee designated at such time prior to the holding of said encampment as may be agreed upon by the Secretary of War and Scott Hanna, chairman of the mount committee: And provided further, That the Secretary of War, before delivering said saddles and bridles, shall take from said Scott Hanna a good and sufficient bond for the safe return of said property in good order and condition, and the whole without expense to the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The House joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an article prepared by Mr. George P. Hampton, published in the Pennsylvania Grange News, July, 1914, on "The administration at Washington fighting for the people's rights."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD an article from the Pennsylvania Grange News entitled "Administration at Washington fighting for people's rights." Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, my attention was attracted by the reference to Pennsylvania. I would like to know who the author of the article is.

Mr. COX. I stated that it was Mr. George P. Hampton.

Mr. MOORE. That is a very good name, and I have no objection.

Mr. COX. It is a good article, too.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. GLASS, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence, for two weeks, on account of illness.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may be allowed five days to extend remarks on the bill under consideration to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that all Members be allowed five days in which to extend remarks in the RECORD on the irrigation bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Colorado means to print remarks, and it is not confined to those who have spoken?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; general leave to print on the bill.

The SPEAKER. Leave to insert remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Rev. J. L. Kibler, D. D., of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

We thank Thee, our heavenly Father, for Thy many mercies and for Thy love, which is boundless. We thank Thee for our lives and for places where we may labor for the good of others, and so fulfill the law of Christ. We thank Thee for the providence that has given us our opportunities of service for our country. May we be inspired by those high ideals which Thou hast implanted in the consciences of men. May the gentleness of Thy grace lead us on and move us to those things that are pleasing in Thy sight, that we may meet our tasks this day in Thy strength. We ask it for Christ's sake. Amen.

THE FARMER AND DIRECT LEGISLATION.

Mr. NORRIS. I have here a short address entitled "The farmer and direct legislation," by George P. Hampton, secretary of the Progressive State Granges and of the Farmers' National Committee on Popular Government. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The address referred to is as follows:

THE FARMER AND DIRECT LEGISLATION.

(By George P. Hampton, secretary Progressive State Granges and secretary Farmers' National Committee on Popular Government.)

AN ADDRESS DELIVERED AT THE FIRST NATIONAL CONFERENCE ON POPULAR GOVERNMENT, WASHINGTON, D. C., DECEMBER 6, 1913.

The farmer is often referred to as the backbone of the Nation, and the organized progressive farmers whom I have the honor to represent here are, I believe, justly entitled to the credit of being the backbone of the direct-legislation movement. The organized labor forces of the American Federation of Labor may, perhaps with propriety, contest this claim, and reviewing their splendid work for direct legislation, and with keen remembrance of their timely cooperation in the campaigns to secure legislative results, I gladly concede that the progressive organized labor forces, jointly with the progressive farmers, have been the chief source of the power that has made the direct-legislation successes of the past possible. And I confidently assert that the chief thing that gives this new National Popular Government League so sure a guaranty of success in the accomplishment of its great work is that it will have affiliated with it and have the earnest cooperation of the combined forces of the organized progressive farmers and the federated labor organizations of the Nation. If the popular-government advocates outside these organized forces show equal earnestness in cooperation with the league, its success is assured.

It is not my intention to take your time with any argument for direct legislation or to weary you with an extended review of the part taken by the progressive farmers in the direct-legislation movement. That would be carrying coals to Newcastle and would be a waste of time of the conference, already overloaded with a mass of work which it is important should be acted upon before adjournment. My purpose in coming before you is simply to impress upon you the fact that the progressive granges are deeply in earnest in this matter. They are intense, determined, and consistent in their opposition to machine rule, and are fundamental in their demands for direct legislation. They are for the people's rule in everything that the term implies.

The Farmers' Alliance was the pioneer in the direct-legislation movement, and the grand old leader of the Farmers' Alliance and "father of direct legislation" in South Dakota, H. L. Loucks, of that State, is an honored member of the Farmers' National Committee on Popular Government and its chief lecturer in the national field. The significance of this statement lies in the fact that South Dakota in 1898 was the first State in the Union to establish the initiative and referendum. Since then in every progressive grange State from Maine to Washington the farmers have been continuously in the forefront of the direct-legislation movement, and I can perhaps best express the spirit of the progressive farmers' attitude toward direct legislation by the following, from a Fourth of July public address, 1908, by State Master C. B. Kegley, of Washington, on "The mission of the grange." I quote:

"The grange stands for equality in citizenship and appeals to all men and women to consider earnestly the underlying causes that rob citizens of their sovereign rights and give the sovereign power into the hands of bosses and special-privilege corruptionists. The grange stands for the people's rule, and as the leader of the grange in this State I appeal to everyone—patrons, men citizens who can vote, women citizens who are now denied that right, and to the youth—citizens to be—to work for direct legislation, the initiative, referendum, and recall."

Here you have the appeal for united action—the union of all forces to accomplish the great common purpose. In this spirit, under the leadership of this master, the progressive farmers of Washington have moved steadily forward until to-day that State offers to the country the most splendid example of the union of nonpartisan progressive forces for the common good. It centers in a "joint legislative committee of the Direct Legislation League of Washington, State Federation of Labor, Farmers' Union, and State Grange on laws and amendments of importance to all voters." To this, since women have had the suffrage in Washington, has been added the League of Women's Nonpartisan Political Clubs.

The fight for direct legislation fundamentally sound and free from "jokers" is on to a finish in every State where the progressive farmers are able to make an effective fight; and, keenly realizing the need of carrying this fight into the national field, thereby securing the great increase in strength from united effort and the establishment of a central bureau, the progressive granges, at their annual conference in Atlantic City in November, 1910, issued an appeal to progressives, which, as it is short, I will quote in full:

"APPEAL TO PROGRESSIVES.

"The Conference of Progressive State Granges, believing that the organized progressive farmers form a solid nucleus around which the progressive forces of the Nation can gather for nonpartisan educational campaigns, appeal to all progressives to join with them and become active participants in these educational campaigns, first, by organizing progressive leagues to cooperate with the farmers, and, second, by becoming honorary patrons of those farmers' national committees whose objects appeal to them as most important or paramount."

This was promptly followed by the organization of the Farmers' National Committee on Popular Government, "organized to"—I quote from its prospectus—"assist in extending to all States the Oregon system of popular government, including the initiative and referendum, an efficient direct primary, corrupt practices act, the recall, and the presidential preference law."

In these days, when the presidential primary is so much in evidence, it may be well to note that the progressive granges had it on their program and were working for it three years ago.

Members of this First National Conference on Popular Government, I think I have said enough to show you that the progressive farmers of the Nation are with you, and that, if you carry out the main purpose of this conference and see to it that the National Popular Government League is made a center of strength and a clearing house for the popular government workers throughout the Union, the progressive farmers will be with you to the end.

These national leagues, federations, or associations—call them what you will—uniting all the people having a common purpose, is the goal of progressive grange endeavor, not alone in the field of popular government, but in every field where the people must battle with intrenched special privilege. In their fight for the parcel post the progressive granges organized, first, the Farmers' National Committee on Postal Improvement; then, in cooperation with the progressive leaders of the Farmers' Union, lined up over 2,000,000 organized farmers, and then assisted in organizing the Postal Express Federation in the same way they are now working with you to launch the National Popular Government League. The parcel-post fight was so speedily successful because, ignoring their differences, farmers, organized workers, merchants, and manufacturers worked together through a central association to a common end, and it may not be out of place to add that their chief expert adviser in this movement was Congressman DAVID J. LEWIS, of Maryland, a union-card labor man. In the more fundamental work of assisting in establishing popular government throughout the Union I can assure you that the progressive farmers will be no less earnest. If there is any damper at all placed on this movement, I feel that it is more likely to come from city workers, who may fail to realize the vital importance of this central association.

In conclusion permit me to say it is gratifying to the progressive granges that a member of the grange should be selected as the executive secretary of the National Popular Government League, and, for myself, I think I may be permitted to say the fact that Senator OWEN and Judson King will be at the helm adds greatly to my confidence in the permanent success of the league.

PRESIDENT WILSON AND THE PROPOSED TRADE COMMISSION.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have here extracts from the President's book entitled "The New Freedom," giving his views as to a Federal trade commission, which I ask unanimous consent may be inserted in the RECORD. The italics are mine.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"PRESIDENT WILSON AND THE PROPOSED TRADE COMMISSION.

[Extracts from President Wilson's "The New Freedom," published 1913.]

"CHAPTER IX.—BENEVOLENCE, OR JUSTICE?

"Mr. Roosevelt attached to his platform some very splendid suggestions as to noble enterprises which we ought to undertake for the uplift of the human race; but when I hear an ambitious platform put forth I am very much more interested in the dynamics of it than in the rhetoric of it. I have a very practical mind, and I want to know who are going to do those things and how they are going to be done. If you have read the trust plank in that platform as often as I have read it you have found it very long but very tolerant. It did not anywhere condemn monopoly, except in words; its essential meaning was that the trusts have been bad and must be made to be good. You know that Mr. Roosevelt long ago classified trusts for us as good and bad, and he said that he was afraid only of the bad ones. Now, he does not desire that there should be any more bad ones, but proposes that they should all be made good by discipline, directly applied by a commission of Executive appointment. All he explicitly complains of is lack of publicity and lack of fairness; not the exercise of power, for throughout that plank the power of the great corporations is accepted as the inevitable consequence of the modern organization of industry. All that it is proposed to do is to take them under control and regulation. The national administration having for 16 years been virtually under the regulation of the trusts, it would be merely a family matter were the parts reversed and were the other members of the family to exercise the regulation. And the trusts apparently, which might, in such circumstances, comfortably continue to administer our affairs under the mollifying influences of the Federal Government, would then, if you please, be the instrumentalities by which all the humanistic, benevolent program of the rest of that interesting platform would be carried out!

"I have read and reread that plank, so as to be sure that I get it right. All that it complains of is—and the complaint is a just one, surely—that these gentlemen exercise their power in a way that is secret. Therefore we must have publicity. Sometimes they are arbitrary; therefore they need regulation. Sometimes they do not consult the general interests of the community; therefore they need to be reminded of those general interests by an industrial commission. But at every turn it is the trusts who are to do us good and not we ourselves.

"Again, I absolutely protest against being put into the hands of trustees. Mr. Roosevelt's conception of government is Mr. Taft's conception, that the Presidency of the United States is the presidency of a board of directors. I am willing to admit that if the people of the United States can not get justice for themselves, then it is high time that they should join the third party and get it from somebody else. The justice proposed is very beautiful; it is very attractive; there were planks in that platform which stir all the sympathies of the heart; they proposed things that we all want to do. But the question is, Who is going to do them? Through whose instrumentality? Are Americans ready to ask the trusts to give us in pity what we ought in justice to take?

"The third party says that the present system of our industry and trade has come to stay. Mind you, these artificially built up things, these things that can't maintain themselves in the market without monopoly, have come to stay, and the only thing that the Government can do, the only thing that the third party proposes should be done, is to set up a commission to regulate them. It accepts them. It says: 'We will not undertake—it were futile to undertake—to prevent monopoly, but we will go into an arrangement by which we will make these monopolies kind to you. We will guarantee that they shall be pitiful. We will guarantee that they shall pay the right wages. We will guarantee that they shall do everything kind and public-spirited, which they have never heretofore shown the least inclination to do.'

"Don't you realize that that is a blind alley? You can't find your way to liberty that way. You can't find your way to social reform through the forces that have made social reform necessary.

"The fundamental part of such a program is that the trusts shall be recognized as a permanent part of our economic order, and that the Government shall try to make trusts the ministers, the instruments, through which the life of this country shall be justly and happily developed on its industrial side. Now, everything that touches our lives sooner or later goes back to the industries which sustain our lives. I have often reflected that there is a very human order in the petitions in our Lord's prayer. For we pray, first of all, 'Give us this day our daily bread,' knowing that it is useless to pray for spiritual graces on an empty stomach, and that the amount of wages we get, the kind of clothes we wear, the kind of food we can afford to buy, is fundamental to everything else.

"Those who administer our physical life therefore administer our spiritual life, and if we are going to carry out the fine purpose of that great chorus which supporters of the third party sang almost with religious fervor then we have got to find out through whom these purposes of humanity are going to be realized. It is a mere enterprise, so far as that part of it is concerned, of making the monopolies philanthropic.

"I do not want to live under a philanthropy. I do not want to be taken care of by the Government, either directly or by any instruments through which the Government is acting. I want only to have right and justice prevail, so far as I am concerned. Give me right and justice and I will undertake to take care of myself. If you enthrone the trusts as the means of the development of this country under the supervision of the Government, then I shall pray the old Spanish proverb, 'God save me from my friends, and I'll take care of my enemies.' Because I want to be saved from these friends. Observe that I say these friends, for I am ready to admit that a great many men who believe that the development of industry in this country through monopolies is inevitable intend to be the friends of the people. Though they profess to be my friends, they are undertaking a way of friendship which renders it impossible that they should do me the fundamental service that I demand, namely, that I should be free and should have the same opportunities that everybody else has.

"For I understand it to be the fundamental proposition of American liberty that we do not desire special privilege, because we know special privilege will never comprehend the general welfare. This is the fundamental, spiritual difference between adherents of the party now about to take charge of the Government and those who have been in charge of it in recent years. They are so indoctrinated with the idea that only the big business interests of this country understand the United States and can make it prosperous that they can not divorce their thoughts from that obsession. They have put the Government into the hands of trustees, and Mr. Taft and Mr. Roosevelt were the rival candidates to preside over the board of trustees. They were candidates to serve the people, no doubt, to the best of their ability, but it was not their idea to serve them directly; they proposed to serve them indirectly through the enormous forces already set up, which are so great that there is almost an open question whether the Government of the United States, with the people back of it, is strong enough to overcome and rule them.

"Shall we try to get the grip of monopoly away from our lives or shall we not? Shall we withhold our hand and say monopoly is inevitable; that all that we can do is to regulate it? Shall we say that all that we can do is to put government in competition with monopoly and try its strength against it? Shall we admit that the creature of our own hands is stronger than we are? We have been dreading all along the time when the combined power of high finance would be greater than the power of the Government. Have we come to a time when the President of the United States or any man who wishes to be the President must doff his cap in the presence of this high finance and say, 'You are our inevitable master, but we will see how we can make the best of it'?

"We are at the parting of the ways. We have not one or two or three, but many established and formidable monopolies in the United States. We have not one or two, but many fields of endeavor into which it is difficult, if not impossible, for the independent man to enter. We have restricted credit, we have restricted opportunity, we have controlled development, and we have come to be one of the worst ruled, one of the most completely controlled and dominated Governments in the civilized world—no longer a Government by free opinion, no longer a Government by conviction and the vote of the majority, but a Government by the opinion and the duress of small groups of dominant men.

"If the Government is to tell big business men how to run their business, then don't you see that big business men have to get closer to the Government even than they are now? Don't you see that they must capture the Government in order not to be restrained too much by it? Must capture the Government? They have already captured it. Are you going to invite those inside to stay inside? They don't have to get there. They are there. Are you going to own your own premises or are you not? That is your choice. Are you going to say, 'You didn't get into the house the right way, but you are in there,

God bless you. We will stand out here in the cold, and you can hand us out something once in a while'?

"At the least, under the plan I am opposing, there will be an avowed partnership between the Government and the trusts. I take it that the firm will be ostensibly controlled by the senior member. For I take it that the Government of the United States is at least the senior member, though the younger member has all along been running the business. But when all the momentum, when all the energy, when a great deal of the genius, as so often happens in partnerships the world over, is with the junior partner, I do not think that the superintendence of the senior partner is going to amount to very much. And I do not believe that benevolence can be read into the hearts of the trusts by the superintendence and suggestions of the Federal Government, because the Government has never within my recollection had its suggestions accepted by the trusts. On the contrary, the suggestions of the trusts have been accepted by the Government.

"There is no hope to be seen for the people of the United States until the partnership is dissolved. And the business of the party now intrusted with power is going to be to dissolve it.

"Those who supported the third party supported, I believe, a program perfectly agreeable to the monopolies. How those who have been fighting monopoly through all their career can reconcile the continuation of the battle under the banner of the very men they have been fighting I can not imagine. I challenge the program in its fundamentals as not a progressive program at all. Why did Mr. Gary suggest this very method when he was at the head of the Steel Trust? Why is this very method commended here, there, and everywhere by the men who are interested in the maintenance of the present economic system of the United States? Why do the men who do not wish to be disturbed urge the adoption of this program? The rest of the program is very handsome; there is beating in it a great pulse of sympathy for the human race. But I do not want the sympathy of the trusts for the human race. I do not want their condescending assistance.

"And I warn every progressive Republican that by lending his assistance to this program he is playing false to the very cause in which he had enlisted. That cause was a battle against monopoly, against control, against the concentration of power in our economic development, against all those things that interfere with absolutely free enterprise. I believe that some day these gentlemen will wake up and realize that they have misplaced their trust, not in an individual, it may be, but in a program which is fatal to the things we hold dearest.

"If there is any meaning in the things I have been urging it is this: That the incubus that lies upon this country is the present monopolistic organization of our industrial life. That is the thing which certain Republicans became 'insurgents' in order to throw off. And yet some of them allowed themselves to be so misled as to go into the camp of the third party in order to remove what the third party proposed to legalize. My point is that this is a method conceived from the point of view of the very men who are to be controlled, and that this is just the wrong point of view from which to conceive it.

"I said not long ago that Mr. Roosevelt was promoting a plan for the control of monopoly which was supported by the United States Steel Corporation. Mr. Roosevelt denied that he was being supported by more than one member of that corporation. He was thinking of money. I was thinking of ideas. I did not say that he was getting money from these gentlemen; it was a matter of indifference to me where he got his money; but it was a matter of a great deal of difference to me where he got his ideas. He got his idea with regard to the regulation of monopoly from the gentlemen who form the United States Steel Corporation. I am perfectly ready to admit that the gentlemen who control the United States Steel Corporation have a perfect right to entertain their own ideas about this and to urge them upon the people of the United States, but I want to say that their ideas are not my ideas; and I am perfectly certain that they would not promote any idea which interfered with their monopoly. Inasmuch, therefore, as I hope and intend to interfere with monopoly just as much as possible, I can not subscribe to arrangements by which they know that it will not be disturbed.

"The Roosevelt plan is that there shall be an industrial commission charged with the supervision of the great monopolistic combinations which have been formed under the protection of the tariff, and that the Government of the United States shall see to it that these gentlemen who have conquered labor shall be kind to labor. I find, then, the proposition to be this, that there shall be two masters, the great corporation, and over it the Government of the United States; and I ask who is going to be master of the Government of the United States? It has a master now—those who in combination control these monopolies. And if the Government, controlled by the monopolies, in its turn controls the monopolies, the partnership is finally consummated.

"I do not care how benevolent the master is going to be; I will not live under a master. That is not what America was created for. America was created in order that every man should have the same chance as every other man to exercise mastery over his own fortunes. (The New Freedom, pp. 193–207.)

"Moreover, under the system proposed most employers—at any rate, practically all of the most powerful of them—would be, to all intents and purposes, wards and protégés of the Government which is the master of us all, for not part of this program can be discussed intelligently without remembering that monopoly as handled by it is not to be prevented, but accepted. It is to be accepted and regulated. All attempt to resist it is to be given up. It is to be accepted as inevitable. The Government is to set up a commission whose duty it will be not to check or defeat it, but merely to regulate it under rules which it is itself to frame and develop. So that the chief employers will have this tremendous authority behind them: What they do they will have the license of the Federal Government to do. (The New Freedom, pp. 210–211.)

"When you have thought the whole thing out, therefore, you will find that the program of the new party legalizes monopolies and systematically subordinates workingmen to them and to plans made by the Government, both with regard to employment and with regard to wages. Take the thing as a whole, and it looks strangely like economic mastery over the very lives and fortunes of those who do the daily work of the Nation; and all this under the overwhelming power and sovereignty of the National Government. What most of us are fighting for is to break up this very partnership between big business and the Government. We call upon all intelligent men to bear witness that if this plan were consummated the great employers and capitalists of the country would be under a more overpowering temptation than ever to take control of the Government and keep it subservient to their purpose.

"What a prize it would be to capture! How unassailable would be the majesty and the tyranny of monopoly if it could thus get sanction of law and the authority of government! By what means, except open revolt, could we ever break the crust of our life again and become free men, breathing an air of our own, living lives that we wrought out for ourselves? The New Freedom, pp. 212–213.)

"There has been a history of the human race, you know, and a history of government; it is recorded; and the kind of thing proposed has been tried again and again and has always led to the same result. History is strewn all along its course with the wrecks of Governments that tried to be humane, tried to carry out humane programs through the instrumentality of those who controlled the material fortunes of the rest of their fellow citizens. (The New Freedom, p. 214.)

"After you have made the partnership between monopoly and your Government permanent, then I invite all the philanthropists in the United States to come and sit on the stage and go through the motions of finding out how they are going to get philanthropy out of their masters.

"I do not want to see the special interests of the United States take care of the working men, women, and children. I want to see justice, righteousness, fairness, and humanity displayed in all the laws of the United States, and I do not want any power to intervene between the people and their Government. Justice is what we want, not patronage and condescension and pitiful helpfulness. The trusts are our masters now, but I, for one, do not care to live in a country called free even under kind masters. I prefer to live under no masters at all." (The New Freedom, p. 216.)

GOLD HILL CONSOLIDATED CO.

Mr. THOMPSON. Pursuant to Senate resolution No. 394, adopted by the Senate on June 19, 1914, directing the Committee on Privileges and Elections to investigate the use of the Senate committee stationery in connection with the Gold Hill Consolidated Co., I submit a report.

Mr. KERN. I ask that the report be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections will be read.

The Secretary read the report (No. 688), as follows:

Mr. THOMPSON, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, submitted the following report, to accompany Senate resolution 394:

The undersigned members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections agree and direct that the accompanying report of the subcommittee appointed to investigate matters connected with the promotion of the Gold Hill Consolidated Co. be adopted and ratified as the report of the full committee, and that this action, with the report of the subcommittee, be reported to the Senate.

REPORT OF SUBCOMMITTEE.

To Hon. JOHN W. KERN,
Chairman of Committee on Privileges and Elections:

Pursuant to Senate resolution No. 394, hereto attached, and appointment thereunder by Hon. JOHN W. KERN, chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, we, the undersigned subcommittee, consisting of Senators WILLIAM H. THOMPSON (chairman), WILLIAM HUGHES, LUKE LEA, WILLIAM S. KENYON, and MOSES E. CLAPP, proceeded to take testimony of all the witnesses within our knowledge possessing any material information on the subject involved, and after thoroughly considering all the evidence adduced on said hearing make the following report on the two questions of inquiry covered by said resolution, and submit herewith all of the evidence taken and considered upon said hearing:

First. Mr. Walter George Newman, the organizer and promoter of the Gold Hill Consolidated Co., of Gold Hill, N. C., on or about the 29th day of May, 1914, had about 40 copies of the following letter made for his own use upon the official letterhead of the Committee on Rules, of which Senator OVERMAN is chairman; and upon the official letterhead of the Committee on Census, of which Senator CHILTON is chairman; and Mr. Newman distributed said copies among his friends and persons interested in said mining proposition:

[Copy of letter.]

GOLD HILL CONSOLIDATED CO.,
Gold Hill, N. C., May 29, 1914.

Hon. W. E. CHILTON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: After spending some 30 days on the Gold Hill property, and feeling you may be interested in what I may know and believe about the property, I write you this condensed information.

I have gone over the property of the Gold Hill Consolidated Co. very carefully, both on the surface and through the mine down to the 800-foot level. After examining seven veins from 2 feet 6 inches to 12 feet in width, sampling and assaying them, I must say I see greater possibilities in the Gold Hill property every day.

My first opinion is fully confirmed that the veins will go to much greater depth than the 800-foot level and carry high values in gold, silver, and copper. The copper veins alone will pay all expenses and show a handsome dividend, leaving the gold and silver clear.

After comparing the Gold Hill property with other mines and mining properties which I have examined both in the United States and Canada on which valuations have been fixed I would say I believe that $60,000,000 valuation on the Gold Hill property a conservative estimate.

Yours, very truly,

(Signed) J. C. WILLIAMS,
Economic and Mining Geologist.

Senators OVERMAN and CHILTON were absent from their respective offices at the time Newman called and had the copies of the letters made, and they never at any time consented to the use of the letterheads by Newman, and never had any knowledge of their use in this manner until some time afterwards, and about the time this inquiry was authorized.

So far as it appears from the evidence, Senator OVERMAN, Senator CHILTON, Senator POMERENE, Senator SWANSON, and Representative FLOOD are the only Congressmen interested in the mining company, and each of these Congressmen bought and paid the prevailing price upon the market for their stock, and none of them received any special favors or inducements from Mr. Newman to purchase said stock, and none of them were in any way responsible for the use of the United States stationery, and we therefore exonerate them from any blame in connection with this matter.

Second. With a view of having reopened the assay office at Charlotte, N. C., which had been discontinued a short time before, Mr. Newman took up the matter with Hon. John Skelton Williams, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. As is usual and customary in such matters, Mr. Williams referred the request to Hon. George E. Roberts, Director of the Mint, who sent Mr. Frederick P. Dewey, assayer of the Bureau of the Mint, to look over the property and make report to the Treasury Department. Mr. Dewey investigated the property and made a report, which report was not such as, in the opinion of the officials of the Treasury Department, to warrant any further action toward the reopening of the assay office at Charlotte.

Hon. John Skelton Williams was not and never has been a stockholder in the Gold Hill Consolidated Mining Co., was not in any way pecuniarily interested therein, and we exonerate him from any blame in connection with this matter.

Respectfully submitted.

WM. H. THOMPSON,
Chairman,
WM. HUGHES,
LUKE LEA,
WM. S. KENYON,
MOSES E. CLAPP,
Subcommittee.

JULY 16, 1914.

Mr. THOMPSON. I ask for the adoption of the report by the Senate.

The report was agreed to.

KNIGHTS OF PYTHIAS NATIONAL ENCAMPMENT.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. From the Committee on Military Affairs, I report back favorably, without amendment, the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 304) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan certain saddles and bridles for the use of the national encampment, Knights of Pythias, to be held at Terre Haute, Ind., in July, 1914, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am not rising to object to the consideration of the joint resolution, or to its passage, but I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon whether any provision is made in the joint resolution that a bond shall be given so that if any damage is done to the property loaned the Government will be indemnified?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say to the Senator that that is provided for. The joint resolution is in the usual form.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AFFAIRS IN MEXICO.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the following resolution coming over from a preceding day.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 415, by Mr. SMITH of Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, the resolution has been read to the Senate twice, and it has gone over from day to day at the request of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations and at my request. I am a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations and as such share with my associates the desire to proceed to the consideration of any matter coming before that committee properly and in order. There is, however, very much involved in this resolution which I should like to discuss. It does not, however, appertain to the situation now unfortunately existing in Mexico. My complaint relates to the origin and source of most of the difficulties which have existed in Mexico for the past three years and which finally culminated in the humiliation of Diaz, the murder of Madero, and the banishment of Huerta, and while I should be quite willing to discuss the origin of this deplorable affair and the intimate connection between professional revolutionists having their headquarters in this Capital and grasping exploiters, whose greed and selfishness knows no bounds, either of decency or patriotism, but I forbear and will take some other occasion to illuminate this aspect of a situation which was born in wickedness and cradled in corruption. However, I think the better plan this morning would be to refer the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I ask that that may be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 13811, the river and harbor bill.

Mr. KENYON. I object, Mr. President.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, from day to day we find ourselves endeavoring to secure the passage of a bill which forms a part of the annual budget of the Government and are met by a parliamentary situation difficult to understand.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Cummins	Martine, N. J.	Sterling
Bankhead	Gallinger	Norris	Stone

Mr. CHILTON. I desire to announce the necessary absence of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL].

Mr. CAMDEN. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. JAMES], who is paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]. I ask that this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. I also desire to announce the absence of the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. KERN. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY]. This announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I understand the motion of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] is pending?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; but it is not debatable.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I understand that. I had just about finished my remarks when a quorum was demanded. Under the rule I am unable to proceed, and I do not think what I have to say is of sufficient importance to ask unanimous consent to enable me to say it. Therefore I will await another opportunity.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill commonly known as the river and harbor bill.

Mr. NORRIS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], and in his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. BRYAN (when Mr. FLETCHER'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] is absent from the city on important public business. I should like to have this announcement stand for the day, without repeating it. My colleague is paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. If present and at liberty to vote on this motion, my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and vote "yea."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). My general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] is so modified as not to apply to questions of this character. I therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE]. I make this transfer for the day. I vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], and withhold my vote.

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. He being absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. I ask that the statement as to my pair and its transfer stand for the day. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. THOMAS. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. CATRON (after having voted in the negative). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], who is absent on account of sickness, and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. McLEAN (after having voted in the negative). I inquire if the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. McLEAN. I have a pair with that Senator, and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The pair which I have with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] I transfer to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] and vote "yea."

Mr. GRONNA (after having voted in the negative). I inquire if the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. GRONNA. I have a pair with that Senator, and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have a pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and therefore refrain from voting.

Mr. PAGE. I wish to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. He is paired with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 17, as follows:

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13811) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I submit a proposed amendment to the bill, which I ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. After line 23, on page 94, it is proposed to insert the following as a new section:

SEC. 14. That the Postmaster General is hereby authorized to pay for ocean mail service under the act of March 3, 1891, in vessels of the second class on routes to South America south of the Equator, to the Philippines, to Japan, to China, and to Australasia at a rate not exceeding $4 per mile on the outward voyage by the shortest practicable routes, and in vessels of the third class on said routes at a rate not exceeding $2 per mile on the outward voyage by the shortest practicable routes: Provided, That, subject to the foregoing provisions, every contract hereunder shall be awarded to that responsible bidder who will contract, under penalties prescribed by the Postmaster General, for the highest running speed between the points named in the contract.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I ask that the proposed amendment be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection that action will be taken.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I voted against the motion to take up the river and harbor bill, and have done so several times. I voted that way not because I am opposed to the bill—I am in favor of the bill—but I did so because in my judgment we are simply wasting the time of the Senate by taking up the river and harbor bill for half an hour or an hour each day. The Senator from North Carolina knows as well as I do that there is determined opposition to the river and harbor bill on the part of some Senators and that that opposition will go to a considerable length, if not to extreme lengths, to defeat his bill, and the only way he can pass it is to bring the bill up and keep it before the Senate until it is considered and voted upon and either passed or defeated. To take it up as we have been taking it up is wasting the time of the Senate and preventing the consideration and passage of meritorious measures on the calendar that could be taken up, considered, and passed before 2 o'clock, when the unfinished business comes up. That is the reason why I voted against taking it up, because, as I understand, the unfinished business will come up in a little over an hour—at 2 o'clock—and then this bill will be laid aside. In my opinion the Senator from North Carolina is simply playing into the hands of the opponents of the bill by bringing it up for an hour or a half an hour each day, and we are shutting out other measures that could be considered until 2 o'clock.

At any time when the Senator is ready to take his bill up and hold it before the Senate, I shall be with him and shall support him in that until the measure can be disposed of one way or the other. I simply desired to explain the reason why I voted to-day as well as on other occasions against taking up the bill, because I do not want my position misunderstood.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senate is entirely aware of the fact that when the motion was made by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] to take up the trade commission bill I antagonized that motion with a motion to take up the river and harbor bill. There was such an expression of sentiment against interfering with speedy action upon the trade commission bill that I withdrew that motion and, as I remember, stated at the time my reason for withdrawing the motion. I have heretofore stated to the Senate that I had an understanding after this time with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], in charge of the trade commission bill, that I would not interfere with the consideration of his bill after the expiration of the morning hour, or after the time when the unfinished business automatically would be laid before the Senate.

I do not feel that the trade commission bill has been pressed as it should have been, but up to this time I have felt myself bound by the understanding which I then had with the Senator from Nevada. I have sought on several occasions to persuade the Senator from Nevada that neither his bill nor the river and harbor bill was making progress under that arrangement, and have endeavored to secure a modification of it. I have not succeeded up to this time. I wish to say now, however, that I think the time has come when the trade commission bill should be placed before the Senate and kept before the Senate continuously until action is had upon it; and if, after to-day, that policy is not pursued with reference to the trade commission bill, I shall feel at liberty to ask the Senate to take up the river and harbor bill and proceed with its consideration to the exclusion of other business.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Do I correctly understand the Senator from North Carolina that the present unfortunate situation, complicated as it is, is the result of any understanding upon his part with the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have stated that to-day, and I stated it several days ago—that feeling that there was an expression of sentiment——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is the only possible way in which such a situation could be accounted for, because it is well known that the passage of the bill presented by the Senator from North Carolina is absolutely essential——

Mr. SIMMONS. I was going into that matter to some extent, if the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. While the bill urged by the Senator from Nevada should not be seriously considered in its present form.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, that may be the view of the Senator from Michigan with reference to the trade commission bill, but I undertake to say that that is not the view of a majority of the Members of the Senate. It is not my view. While I do not mean to say that I approve of the trade commission bill as it now stands, it is my opinion that the passage of that measure essentially in the form in which it is now is of paramount importance to the welfare of this country. I have not felt, and I do not feel now, and I think that has been the feeling on this side of the Chamber—it certainly was the sentiment expressed to me which led me to enter into this understanding with the Senator from Nevada—that it would be right to antagonize the consideration of that bill with the river and harbor bill, and it was for that reason that I entered into the understanding.

But, Mr. President, in my judgment, that bill has not been pressed as it ought to have been pressed. There were conditions that made it impracticable to do that. The Senator from Nevada has stated those conditions, and the Senate has seen those conditions. I have just stated that if the Senator from Nevada shall not find himself in a position after to-day to lay that bill before the Senate and, if he can get the consent of the Senate, keep it before the body until it is finally disposed of, then I shall make a motion to displace that bill permanently in favor of the river and harbor bill.

The Senator from Michigan is entirely right in his statement that there are reasons which should powerfully appeal to the Senate and to the country why the river and harbor bill should have speedy action. It is very well understood that since we have entered upon the new system of annual river and harbor bills all the estimates made by the engineers are based upon the assumption that there will be an annual river and harbor bill. It is well understood that if there should be any failure in the passage of the river and harbor bill at this session of Congress necessarily many of the most important works of river and harbor improvement would have to be suspended. In fact, Mr. President, I think by reason of the failure of the Congress to act upon this bill before the first day of this month quite a number of very important works that are now in progress have been already suspended.

If we are to continue river and harbor work in this country, we have got to appropriate the money with which to do it; and in the conditions which now exist, if we should not pass the river and harbor bill at this session, there would be a suspension, I am advised, of at least one-half of all the river and harbor works that are now in prosecution.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from North Carolina, in view of his solicitude to pass this bill, why he would not agree to striking out all these little matters that are of no earthly consequence to the country, although they are of some consequence to communities, and let us pass a river and harbor bill appropriating for the large rivers and the harbors of the country?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, it is a very easy matter to say that the smaller items in the river and harbor bill are of no consequence to the people of this country. From the time we began work under this system of improving our rivers and harbors in this country it has been the policy of Congress—and it has been, in my judgment, a wise policy—to improve a great many very small streams throughout the country, distributed here and there from one end of the country to the other, in order to facilitate local and community transportation.

Without going into a discussion of that subject, however, if when the bill is taken up item by item Senators who are opposed to the bill are able to point out to the Senate any item that in the judgment of the Senate is not worthy of being prosecuted by the Government, they can do so. I can not be the arbiter, the Senator from New Hampshire can not be the arbiter, to determine whether or not a given appropriation is justified; but when the items are reached that he now asks me to strike out—knowing full well that I have no authority to determine whether an item is worthy or not—the Senator can then make his motion and appeal to the judgment of the Senate, and if he is able to get a majority of Senators to agree with him, they will be stricken out.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator can not instruct me as to my right under the rules of the Senate to make a motion; but——

Mr. SIMMONS. When the Senator asks me why I did not strike them out I can give him my reasons for not doing so.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is entirely safe in suggesting that he is willing to submit it to the Senate, as the friends of the bill are willing to submit it to another body. The Senator knows the theory upon which this bill is constructed, and he knows that in all human probability a majority of the Senate will not strike out any item in the bill; but the Senator and his friends on the other side could agree in advance that the bill should be purged of a great many items that ought not to be in it, to which attention will be called and which will be resisted.

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall have no hesitation in agreeing that any item that a majority of the Senate says ought to be stricken out shall be stricken out.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if the Senator from North Carolina will permit me, I should like to suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that there is not a single item in the bill that ought to be stricken out. Ninety-nine per cent has been recommended by the Board of Engineers.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in view of the fact that Michigan has 40 or 50 items in the bill, of course the Senator thinks nothing should be stricken from the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, Michigan has 15 items in this bill, and all were approved by the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON].

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, that will appear as the bill is debated.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That will appear, and to the entire satisfaction of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Chief of Engineers has been called in to bolster up this kind of legislation, and he admits that one-half of 1 per cent of this bill is fraudulent. That would be about four or five hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, Mr. President, that can not be true. The Senator has been misinformed.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator can read the letter of the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado will state it.

Mr. THOMAS. What question is before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is the river and harbor bill, which is being discussed now, as the Chair understands, in all its general features.

Mr. THOMAS. Then I call for the regular order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I must beg the pardon of the Senator from Colorado, but I was addressing myself to the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly; so was I.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is the regular order. I was addressing myself to the bill. I was interrupted by the Senator from New Hampshire, and I have been trying to reply to some suggestions and inquiries that he made.

The Senator from New Hampshire says I well know that the items of which he does not approve, and which he criticizes, will not be stricken out of the bill. I do not know that the Senate, by a majority vote, will refuse to strike out any item in the bill of which it disapproves; but if it be a fact that a majority of the Senators will not strike out some items that the Senator from New Hampshire thinks are not worthy of Government improvement, then I think the Senator from New Hampshire ought to be willing, as I am willing, to bow to the judgment of a majority of the Senators here, acting upon their responsibility to their constituents and to the country.

Mr. President, I have not seen the letter to which the Senator from New Hampshire refers as emanating from the Chief of Engineers. I do not believe the Senator has correctly reported the Chief of Engineers in the statement that he thought one-half of 1 per cent of the items in this bill were fraudulent. I can not conceive of a Government official making any such declaration as that; but if he has made any such declaration as that, I undertake to say there is no foundation for it. There is not a fraudulent item in the bill. There is not a single item in the bill that has not received the approval of the Board of Engineers and the Chief of Engineers, and that does not come before this body represented as being worthy by the people we have by law intrusted with investigating and determining these matters.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think it is well to keep the record straight in matters of this sort. The Chief of Engineers, in discussing some newspaper article criticizing this bill on the ground that is was a "pork barrel," is reported to have said, and I expect did say, that he was satisfied that not more than one-half of 1 per cent of the bill was "pork." That is what he stated; not that the items were fraudulent, or anything of the sort.

Mr. GALLINGER. What he did say was:

> My judgment is that there is less than one-half of 1 per cent pork in the river and harbor bill now pending.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Not "fraudulent."

Mr. GALLINGER It was a most astonishing communication, emanating from the Chief of Engineers. I think he entirely transcended his authority in making it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, does the Senator from New Hampshire say, if there is any "pork" in this bill, that there is any more "pork" in it than there was in the river and harbor bills that we passed heretofore?

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, I think not. I think North Carolina has had a lot of "pork" in every river and harbor bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Not any more so in this bill than in the river and harbor bills that the Senator from New Hampshire, as a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, has heretofore approved.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will explain that when I come to discuss the bill. I approved them largely to please the Senator from North Carolina, who always appealed to me to stand by his items in the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I should like to ask the two Senators engaged in the colloquy what is meant by the term "pork" in connection with this bill? [Laughter.]

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana had inserted in the RECORD a long communication from a Member of the other House in which he explained very lucidly the meaning of "pork," and I shall call attention to that communication later on.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am not going to stop to discuss the question of "pork" in this bill. We all understand what is meant by that term; and the Senator from New Hampshire only claims that there is one-half of 1 per cent in the bill, according to the statement of the engineer.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, no.

Mr. SIMMONS. He has just said, further, that he does not think there is any more "pork" in this bill than in the bills he has been in the habit of passing heretofore.

Mr. GALLINGER. No, Mr. President; I——

Mr. SIMMONS. Just a moment. It would be a very extraordinary thing if we could pass a river and harbor bill, or any other bill dealing with as many single units as a river and harbor bill does, without there creeping into it some one or two things that were not proper to be put in the bill. If the Senator has in mind any particular items in this bill that he regards as "pork" in the sense in which he has used the term, I should be very glad if he would now or at some future time point out those particular items, and furnish us a list of them, so that we may investigate them.

Mr. GALLINGER. At the proper time I shall call attention to an item in the State of North Carolina where it is asserted by the Engineer Corps that at the head of navigation there is one-tenth of 1 inch of water on that improvement.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know to what item the Senator refers.

Mr. GALLINGER. I shall call attention to it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall be very glad, when we reach that item, if the Senator will call our attention to it, and we will discuss it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yet there is a further appropriation in this bill for that stream when at the head of navigation there is only one-tenth of 1 inch of water at the present time—not enough to wash a new-born babe.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator tell me what stream he is talking about?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will tell the Senator in my own time at the proper time.

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall be very glad to hear the Senator's statement, and I have no doubt I shall be able to meet the Senator's argument upon that question.

Mr. President, I do not care to take up time unnecessarily. I wish to ask to have inserted in the RECORD a memorandum which the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House caused to be prepared, setting forth the urgency of action, so that these different projects may be provided with funds, some of them being now out of funds, and showing the effect of a failure of the passage of this bill at the present session of Congress.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORANDUM CONCERNING THE PRESENT STATUS OF CERTAIN RIVER AND HARBOR WORKS AND PROBABLE EFFECT ON OTHERS IN THE EVENT OF THE FAILURE OF THE PENDING RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

JULY 11, 1914.

The estimates submitted by the Engineer Department in recent years have been submitted on the assumption that there would be a river and harbor act each year, the act to be passed during the long session becoming a law not later than June 30 and that passed during the short session to become a law not later than March 1. Every effort has been made to keep the estimates down to the amounts actually needed to permit of economical prosecution of the works adopted by Congress up to the dates mentioned, and by reason of the regular passage in the past four years of river and harbor acts confidence that this policy would be continued has been gradually acquired; and not only the Engineer Department, but contractors engaged in furnishing materials or doing work under the department have acquired the same confidence and have made their plans accordingly.

On account of lack of funds, work is now suspended, or will shortly be suspended, on about one-third of the works provided for in the pending river and harbor bill. Should no act be passed at this session, the number of works suspended will be very considerably increased before an act could be passed at the next session of Congress. The suspension of work results not only in positive loss of time and possible interference with navigation, but seriously handicaps and greatly adds to the cost of future work by the disorganization of working forces and the effect which it has upon the confidence of contractors supplying materials or doing work for the department.

A list is herewith, showing the present status of the work on a considerable number of river and harbor works. Of the works in urgent need of additional funds attention is particularly invited to the following:

Boston Harbor, Mass., 35-foot channel: While money is on hand to pay all contract requirements for the completion of this channel, there are no funds available for the work of maintaining the completed portions. An estimate of $200,000 was submitted for this work and is carried in the pending bill, and it is very desirable that this amount should be made available at an early day.

Hudson River, N. Y.: This project was adopted in 1910 with a view to completion within a period of four years. Considerable delay was experienced in getting this project started, but the work is now well under way and should be prosecuted without interruption. Unless additional appropriations become available, all work carried on with Government plant and hired labor must be suspended by July 15 or such a reorganization of the working force be made necessary as will tend to further delay the completion of the project and increase the ultimate cost. This project is in extension of the New York State Erie Barge Canal, and the lock and channel involved should be available by the time that canal is completed.

Delaware River between Philadelphia and the sea: The existing (35-foot) project is being prosecuted at the rate of over $1,000,000 a year. When the estimate for the current year was submitted, it was prepared with the expectation that the appropriation would be made on or before June 30, 1914. Unless additional funds become available at an early day, work with Government plant must cease and the present working force be discharged. Work under contract must also be reduced to a minimum in order to cover office expenses and care of plant until work shall be resumed under future appropriations.

Absecon Inlet, N. J., and Wilmington Harbor, Del.: The river and harbor act of 1912 authorized the construction of dredges for these two localities. These dredges will be completed within the next few months, but no funds will be available for their maintenance or operation until provided by Congress.

St. Johns River, Fla.: Unless further funds are provided, work with Government plant, as at present organized, must be suspended about October 1, and the plant laid up or transferred to other localities.

Channel from Apalachicola River to St. Andrews Bay, Fla.: This project was adopted in 1910 and is now near completition; but work with Government plant has already been shut down for lack of funds and further operations must await additional appropriations. An item of $65,000 for completion of this project is carried in the pending bill.

Black Warrior River, Ala., locks and dams: The pending bill contains an item of $750,000 for the completion of this project. Unless these funds become available at an early day work on Dam No. 17 must be suspended.

Southwest Pass, Mississippi River: No funds are available for purchase of stone for raising the jetties, and this important work must be held in abeyance until additional appropriation is made.

Mississippi River between the Missouri River and Minneapolis, Minn.: This project is being prosecuted with a view to completion within a period of 12 years from 1910, and the estimates are prepared with the understanding that additional funds will be made available on or before June 30 of each year. Part of the work with Government plant has already been stopped and more will be suspended on July 15. In addition to the loss to the United States incident to the breaking up of the present working force, storage of plant, etc., failure to proceed with the work at this time will entail great hardship on the contractors on account of large quantities of materials gotten together by them on their own responsibility with a view to future contracts, relying on the declared policy of Congress in favor of an annual river and harbor bill.

Monongahela River, Pa.: Work of reconstruction of Lock and Dam No. 6 will be suspended by August 1, unless additional appropriation be made available prior to that date.

Ohio River, locks and dams: Suspension of work by hired labor on this project will be necessary at an early day, as well as postponement of beginning construction of additional locks and dams, unless further appropriations are made available for the prosecution of this project which is to be completed within a period of 12 years.

Columbia River at The Dalles-Celilo Canal, Oreg.: Work on this project is practically closed and, as the overhead charges there are high, it would be desirable to shut down immediately and entirely if it were not probable that the appropriation for completion of the work which is carried in the pending bill would become available at an early day.

Coos Bay, Oreg.: Unless funds become earlier available, work of dredging with Government plant will close down before August 1, thus losing a part of the most favorable season for work at this locality.

Columbia River at the mouth, Oregon and Washington: Without additional funds work on this project must cease about August 15. Suspension of operations in connection with this improvement must be regarded as most unfortunate. The life of the trestle used in dumping rock into the jetty is short at best, and in addition to being expensive in first cost requires heavy expenditures for its upkeep. Deterioration is as rapid when not in use as when work is in progress. Experience has shown that periods of idleness involve very large sums for restoration of plant and equipment and also increased quantities of rock on account of scour at the exposed end of the jetty. Uninterrupted operations are therefore essential to economy and the accomplishment of the best results. Any considerable delay at this time would greatly add to the cost of an already expensive project.

Columbia and lower Willamette River, below Portland, Oreg.: An expensive plant has been provided by Congress for use in cooperation with the Port of Portland Commission in securing and maintaining a 30-foot channel up to Portland. Unless funds are forthcoming, this plant must be laid up about September 1.

Grays Harbor and Bar, Wash.: This project is similar to that at the mouth of the Columbia River. The work of repair and maintenance of the jetty trestle will be suspended August 1 unless additional funds are provided.

Mississippi River Commission: While work has not yet been suspended on the Mississippi River between Head of Passes and the mouth of Ohio River a longer delay in providing additional appropriations will necessitate limiting the work of the commission to dredging and tend to exhaust all reserves for high-water protection works.

The remainder of the list is made up of works smaller in magnitude, but perhaps relatively as urgent.

Mr. SIMMONS. I also wish to have inserted a memorandum showing the present status of certain river and harbor work and the condition at other localities in the event of the failure of the pending river and harbor bill.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mississippi River Commission.	Failure of bill will necessitate limiting work to dredging and would exhaust all reserves for high-water protection works.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, in the suggestion I made I did not intend to convey the impression that I thought the trade commission bill should be displaced and that the river and harbor bill should be taken up in place of it. I simply meant that the river and harbor bill should not be called up until the situation is such that it can be pressed to a conclusion. I believe it would be wise if the trade commission bill could be postponed for a few days until we get all the trust measures out, so that we may consider them all together or when we know what the whole program is to be. But that probably will not be done, and I do not especially object to having the trade commission bill considered and disposed of. What I did want to suggest was that it is simply a waste of time for the Senate and is a failure to consider other meritorious measures that might be taken up until 2 o'clock, to bring up the river and harbor bill from day to day for consideration for an hour or two and then put it aside.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I do not want to delay the remarks of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], but inasmuch as the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] has suggested that the people of the country are demanding the passage of this bill and anxiously awaiting its passage, I think it is a very opportune time to place in the RECORD an editorial from a great magazine having a circulation of some 6,000,000 in this country. Newspapers certainly reflect the general sentiment of the people, and I ask that this editorial may be read. It is from the Saturday Evening Post, and is very short.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE PEOPLE WANT TO KNOW.

Congress appropriates thirty-five or forty million dollars a year for improvement of rivers and harbors. The bills are passed on the time-honored pork-barrel plan. That the expenditures involve huge waste of public funds, and that a considerable part of them is nothing better than graft in an especially obnoxious form, is commonly believed.

If it were generally accepted that such misuse of money derived from the general public obtained in any other field—say, in the railroad field—Congress would immediately order an investigation. Congressman FREAR proposes in a concurrent resolution that the House shall order a thorough investigation by the Interstate Commerce Commission of river and harbor expenditures. An investigation by a body independent of Congress would be better, but the Interstate Commerce Commission is acceptable.

We feel warranted in assuring Congress that the public would like to know approximately how much of the hundred and fifty millions or upward that has been spent on river and harbor improvement in the last five years has resulted in any tangible public benefit, approximately how much has been wasted, and about how much represents a form of political graft.

We say this without prejudice. A great part of the expenditure may have been quite justified by tangible public benefits resulting from it. The waste may be inconsiderable. But people generally believe that an important portion of the hundred and fifty millions or upward is just a tapping of the public till for the political benefit of individual Congressmen.

Surely that circumstance requires an authoritative investigation. Congress commands extensive resources for investigating. Let it employ them in this case at home.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa sent to the desk and had read an article from the Saturday Evening Post denouncing the present river and harbor bill as being a pork-barrel proposition and full of graft. The Senator from Iowa seems to think that he has invented the theory that the river and harbor bill is a pork-barrel proposition and a graft proposition. There has been no time since I have been in the Senate, and there has not been a time in my recollection since the Government began to appropriate money for rivers and harbors, when a certain class of "uplift" papers in this country and "uplift" magazines, some of them receiving from one to two million dollars a year of graft in connection with the transportation through the mails of their own journals, has not been charging and characterizing this bill as graft. It is no new thing. The same propaganda that is going on in connection with this measure has been carried on in connection with every river and harbor project that has been introduced. The Senator from Iowa is not a discoverer of these new terms, neither is the Saturday Evening Post. This is not the first bill to which they have been applied.

Mr. KENYON. I do not claim to be any discoverer. The people of the country have discovered it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, of course I do not like the phrase which has been applied to this bill, and I shall not dignify it by repeating it. It is not becoming to the man who utters it, neither is it proper phraseology in a Chamber of this character. I think it is very bad form, indeed, to allow an impression to prevail that this bill lacks the sanction of the engineers of the Army.

Now, I want to tell you the only interest that I have in the bill. The items for my State have come automatically from the Engineer Department of the Army. Neither by word or writing have I contributed in any way to the desire for the approval of the War Department.

I did put an appropriation in of $25,000 to finish up a harbor which serves a country community and is absolutely essential to their welfare. That community having built the harbor at their own expense at a cost of $75,000, the Engineer Corps estimated that it would take $150,000 to put the harbor in such shape as it ought to be put in. Two years ago we appropriated $10,000 to that harbor on my suggestion. The engineer officers expended the money, and said it was wisely expended. Last year we put $15,000 in the bill for the same project, which the engineers expended, and said it was wisely expended. This year the project which was to cost $150,000 as estimated for by the engineers is to be finished by an appropriation of $25,000.

Is not that economy? I think it is.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to ask the Senator from Michigan a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Michigan is a member, as I am, of the Committee on Commerce, and he has been a member for quite a number of years. I think the Senator from Michigan has been a member of the subcommittee that has considered the river and harbor bill item by item for a number of years. I wish to ask the Senator from Michigan if since he has been a member of that committee there has ever been any more thorough investigation and consideration to the various items of any river and harbor bill within his knowledge than there was given to this bill by the subcommittee having it in charge?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No, Mr. President. I have no hesitation whatever in saying that the subcommittee, with great thoroughness and conscientiousness, approached their task and performed their work well. The mystifying part of it all to me is that such a subcommittee, consisting of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], and myself, were in practical accord from the time we started that work until it was finished. I say without any hesitation, because it is just to him to say and to his credit to say that the distinguished Senator from Ohio, while a number of the projects did not come in the form in which he would have desired, put the stamp of his approval upon nine-tenths of this bill without any hesitation whatever. The Engineer Corps, who have been given paramount authority in appropriations of this character, have estimated and have recommended, uninfluenced by local clamor or self-concern, 99 per cent of this bill.

I understand that there was not a single item put in in the House of Representatives that was not estimated for except one item, which was put in on the floor after the bill reached the House. It was within the province of the House to do it. They have the right and the power and the authority to recast the bill entirely if they desire, but they put just one item in, as I am informed.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. RANSDELL. I should like to ask the Senator if he alludes to the item for Vicksburg Harbor?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do.

Mr. RANSDELL. I understand that was recommended by the Chief of Engineers. I am informed by Mr. HUMPHREY, a member of the House committee, and it is my recollection that it was recommended by the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have no doubt of it. However, the recommendation did not reach the committee when the bill was being considered in committee, I believe, and the item was placed upon the bill on the floor.

Mr. RANSDELL. It was reported favorably by the Engineer Corps.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; but the item was placed upon the bill on the floor after the bill reached the House.

Mr. President, my honored friend from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] laid the foundation for much of the work which is now being perfected under the river and harbor acts. He did it with care and conscientiousness and thoroughness. No man in the entire country understands that situation better than he. If these projects were wrong they were wrong in their inception. To leave them now unfinished would be a poor policy. The department does not believe it can safely do it. To set this whole bill aside or place it in the category of abandoned and undesirable legislation is not to our credit.

When the work of deepening harbors, dredging rivers, and caring for our inland shipping was determined upon, the Government was committed to a great work, and it has been performed with wonderful thoroughness. If I should ever be called upon, as probably I never will be, to credit the distinguished Senator from Ohio with his most important work as a legislator—and all his work has been important; all reflects credit upon his country and upon his State; it has been intelligent and well directed and carefully considered, and I lament that the country is not to have the benefit of his services longer—if I were to ascribe to him the most important work that he has accomplished during his years of usefulness as a public servant, I should say it was his familiarity, careful scrutiny, and unhesitating purpose to put into law the great improvements that mark the history of the last quarter of a century in river and harbor work.

This bill, which may be his final work in that direction, is not discreditable to him at all. It is creditable to him, and he will take his due share of responsibility for it. If here and there some improvement seems unjustified or if time has shown that in its incipiency it was not wise, it is too late to stop it. It would be more extravagant to stop it now than to go ahead and complete the work, and leave to future generations of our countrymen the question whether it is meritorious and desirable.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Michigan a question about one proposition in his State. We have appropriated over $500,000 for Grand River. I should like to ask the Senator if he is very familiar with the Grand River?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am. I bathed in it when I was a boy and nearly drowned in it in my youth.

Mr. KENYON. If there is enough water to drown anybody in it, it is different from many of these streams.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The boy who was with me did drown, much to my regret.

Mr. KENYON. And it was our good fortune that the Senator did not. Does the Senator believe that the money expended there resulted in such an improvement of navigation for the general public as to justify that large expenditure?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I want the Senator to listen to what I say. Grand River is the largest river in Michigan. It has its origin in the home city of my colleague, Senator TOWNSEND. It flows down through a rich agricultural country, through numerous villages and cities in my State, and it passes through Grand Rapids, my home. It assumes large proportions. At times it has been 16 feet deep. One of my predecessors in the House many years before I entered, Mr. Houseman, a very distinguished citizen of Grand Rapids, secured an early appropriation——

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator from Michigan let me interrupt him? I wish to ask the Senator if there is any appropriation in this bill for that river?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; not a cent; but that does not matter. My friend from Iowa put his finger on Grand River and I am going to keep his finger there until I get it wet, at least; and when he draws it out he will find that there has been no waste of money there.

One of my predecessors, a very distinguished Democrat, in the House of Representatives as early at 1870 secured an appropriation of $50,000, I believe, for that river. There were steamboats upon it and a goodly traffic. Time went on and I came into the House of Representatives. I found the chamber of commerce and the business people of my community demanding that that natural highway, but 39 miles from Lake Michigan, should be improved. At that time we had a city of about 75,000 people. It was supposed that a waterway of 10 feet of water would be all that we would ever need. Col. Ludlow, who has distinguished himself as a Government engineer, who has done some of the most important work in the history of this Government, and who died with his laurels thick upon him, recommended that project to the Government. I had nothing to do with it at all. After he recommended it I secured, through the cooperation of my friend from Ohio, who sits by my side [Mr. BURTON], all the appropriations I ever got for it.

I said that river was sometimes 16 feet in depth. It passes down through my home city oftentimes like a torrent. There is not an exposed part of the Mississippi River more hazardous than a certain portion of Grand River at certain times of the year. My own city raised and has expended over a million dollars to protect its people from inundation from that river. Many engineers, including Mr. Noble and Mr. Cooley, have said that the way to protect our city from annual inundation is to have that river dredged to a lower bottom, through which this vast volume of water might pour.

Mr. SIMMONS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. My community has paid a million dollars in money for that work in recent years, and that expenditure began since we had the last appropriation.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Michigan yield?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Let me first yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understood the Senator from Michigan to say that the river of which he is speaking, to which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] called attention, is not appropriated for in the pending bill?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No.

Mr. SIMMONS. There has been some money spent upon that river for its improvement?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; and it has been very wisely spent.

Mr. SIMMONS. Four hundred or five hundred thousand dollars, I believe?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. About $500,000, I believe.

Mr. KENYON. It was $502,000, according to the report of the Secretary of War.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; it was $502,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. What I want to ask the Senator is this: That improvement is completed, and is not carried in this bill?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No, Mr. President; let me correct the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is completed for that project?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; let me conclude. Acting upon Col. Ludlow's report and on Col. Lockwood's report, appropriations amounting perhaps to $100,000 every two years were made. While I was a Member of the House of Representatives that money was expended upon a 10-foot project from Grand Rapids to Lake Michigan, 39 miles, I believe. The distinguished Senator from Ohio came to our city and suggested that the community should expend some money; that they should, if they were interested, get some vessels on the river. Promptly money was raised from private subscription. Boats were put on the river; but under the narrow policy of the Government at that time this project was pruned down from a 10-foot project, recommended by Col. Ludlow, and upon which our appropriations were made, to a 6-foot project, which was entirely inadequate for our purposes.

Our city when those appropriations were made had a population of about 80,000; it now has 135,000 people, and is the second largest city in our State. The only reason the project has not been completed is because under the report for a 6-foot channel I did not believe the money could be wisely expended, and I refused to ask for it. Under the 10-foot project the improvement would have been completed long ago and the river would have borne upon its bosom an ample commerce which would have been distinctly creditable to the Government.

Is the Senator from Iowa satisfied with my statement? I have never asked for a cent since the project was reduced to a 6-foot project; and, of course, no traffic resulted on that kind of a project.

Mr. KENYON. Is there any commerce carried on that river?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Only small boats.

Mr. KENYON. Under this 6-foot project?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. I have not heard the Senator say anything about the character of the commerce, and that is an element that would be involved in the matter.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The commerce would be the natural commerce of a city of 135,000 people, most of which is manufactures; but we can not take our commerce down that river, unload it, place it on lake steamers, and transfer it again to cars. It is impracticable.

Mr. KENYON. There must be a 10-foot project, the Senator thinks, in order to accomplish that purpose?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Nothing less than 10 feet would be of any use to our community; and when the engineer's report cut it down to 6 feet, I reduced my activities proportionately; I have never asked for assistance from the Government since, and I never shall for such a project.

Mr. KENYON. But there was cooperation there between the city and the Government?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There was, and we spent over a million dollars in our work of erecting walls. The moment we can have 10 feet of water from Grand Rapids up to Lake Michigan, I assure the Senator from Iowa that that project will be revived, and all the energy at my command will be expended on it. The commerce which will result from our great center of activity, and also from that part of western Michigan naturally tributary to the river, will amply justify any expenditure made by the Government.

Has the Senator from Iowa any further inquiry?

Mr. KENYON. I am very thankful to the Senator from Michigan, and very much delighted to learn that the money, in his judgment, has been properly expended.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not finished my inquiry. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] clearly intimates that this $500,000 expended upon this 10-foot project was not justified and calls for an explanation. I want to ask the Senator just this question, for I should like to have the answer to it go into the RECORD: The Senator has stated that all of this money was spent upon a 10-foot project——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; I think so.

Mr. SIMMONS. And he justified its expenditure. Now, can the Senator tell us when this 10-foot project was adopted and when this $500,000 under it was expended?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes. It was adopted in 1896, I think, while my honored friend from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] was a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives, and I appreciated his interest in the matter. I think he was wise, and I do not think he regrets it to-day. That community has more than met his expectations. It is a great, thriving manufacturing center. With the largest river in our State running from that city to Lake Michigan, only 39 miles away, with a project for a 10-foot channel which can be completed under an expenditure of $600,000 or $700,000, it now looks like folly to say that the project would not be desirable.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. RANSDELL. I wish to ask the Senator from Michigan if the last appropriation for the Grand River was not the sum of $88,000 carried in the perfect river and harbor bill of 1907, and if it is not a fact that the Senator has not asked for an appropriation since because the commerce fell off and he did not feel that he was warranted in asking for it?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Not because the commerce fell off. I want to put the Senator straight about that, because he and I are on the committee. I do not want him to get any impression that we have gone backward. Our community has gone forward by leaps and bounds. Instead of having a city, as we did then, of 80,000 people we have one now of 135,000 people, and our commerce has not only never fallen off, but has doubled and trebled.

Mr. RANSDELL. But the last appropriation was made in that act, was it not?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The only reason why we failed to continue the improvement of the river to completion was because the Engineer Corps reduced the maximum depth from 10 feet to 6 feet, which our community did not think was sufficient. Therefore I as their representative refused to ask for any more money on such a project.

Mr. RANSDELL. They did receive $88,000 in the river and harbor act of 1907, did they not?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; I think that was regularly estimated for.

Mr. RANSDELL. And $100,000 in the river and harbor act of 1905?
